David's Confession.

Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 16. Psalm 32:1-11. Golden Text, Psalm 51:10.

DAVID had evidently passed through a very bitter experience when he wrote the psalm which is the subject of the lesson. Even the critics who doubt so many things, as to date and authorship, generally concede that the warrior king did write it, and they now substantially agree that he wrote it after his disgraceful fall and restoration. The sentences of the composition have a ring of deep emotion which confirms this belief. It is no contemplative poem, or mere pious reflection, but a strong expression of personal feeling wrung from a heart still throbbing with pain. The words are those of a man who has passed through deep waters, who has escaped a terrible danger and has been under the dread of impending calamity. The psalm is inscribed, "Maschil," which indicates its teaching, or instructive, purpose, and this was clearly in the author's mind when he wrote it. He wants every man who falls into sin to know not only that God pardons, but that the only course open to the sinner that has in it the promise of peace and blessedness, is to make humble confession to God and seek pardon. He declares that he had taken that course and could therefore speak from experience. We can imagine how much it must have cost the king to come out thus openly before all his people and thus publicly confess his wrongdoing by writing the hymn which was to be sung in the public service of the Tabernacle. He does it for the good of other people, and we may well believe that the full story with all its horrible and repulsive details was put in God's Word with the same motive, and, therefore, should not be avoided or ignored.

The psalm is divided into three portions marked off by the word "Selah." This word still puzzles Bible scholars in spite of all the study that has been given to it. The general and most probable belief is that it is a musical term of direction to the choir. It indicates either a pause in the music when there was complete silence, or when the singers were silent and the musical instruments continued to play. The three divisions have each a separate message. In the first, David describes the sin of the man who, after a period of wickedness and sullen impenitence, goes in contrition to God and receives assurance of pardon. The load is lifted from the aching shoulders, the sun rises and drives away the darkness of the night. In the second division, David takes consolation from the fact that to the end of time men will learn from his experience how good God is to the humble penitent, and will be encouraged by his example to go to God with confidence. In the third division, God himself is supposed to be speaking and urging men for their own sake to be docile, as the only way of escaping sorrow. They ought to have more sense than the brutes, who must be bound and harnessed, in order that they may do what they have to do. The child of God should be so receptive and so quick to do God's will, so thoroughly in unison with him that he does not need constraint or correction. God can guide him with his eye. There is no need of a pull on the bridle or a touch of the whip. A look is sufficient.

"Nathan said to David, Thou art the man."

The sorrowful fact about this psalm is the hideous crime which preceded it. There will be some difficulty in explaining the facts to the children, but it will be unwise to be silent about them. They will be told at some time in their lives, and it is better that they should hear the story from one who will tell it with a warning, than that they should hear it first from some tempter, who will suggest the inference that there is no great harm in falling as did the "man after God's own heart." Briefly, it appears that David, yielding to the affectionate pleading of his people that he should not expose himself to peril, remained at home in his new palace in Jerusalem, while Joab commanded the army that was besieging the Ammonite capital. He was, it is believed, about fifty years of age, a man of strong passions, who had suddenly exchanged a life of hardship and activity for a life of luxury and comparative idleness. That is always a period of peculiar danger when temptation is most likely to succeed. At this time, David became infatuated with Bathsheba, a woman who, according to Jewish traditions, was not only beautiful, but singularly talented and cultured. If she had been an ordinary woman, there would have been no difficulty in those times in David adding her to his already numerous household. But she was the wife of a distinguished officer of his own body-guard, and she was also the grand-daughter of Ahithophel, one of his chief counsellors. If David had not been beside himself with infatuation he would have perceived that an intrigue with her was peculiarly disgraceful. But he gave way to his passions and after stooping to the grossest meanness, contrived, with the assistance of the unscrupulous Joab, the death of the husband. Then he made Bathsheba his wife and perhaps thought himself safe from exposure. After the lapse of about a year, during which his conscience must have troubled him, Nathan was sent to him to bring his offence home. He submits to David a case of oppression and asks his opinion. The King, severe as wrongdoers often are, would have a man put to death who had appropriated a lamb belonging to another. Then Nathan had the courage to denounce him to his face. The king quailed under the reproof, and confessed his sin. Nathan was authorized to grant God's forgiveness but not to relieve him be vigilant against temptation, especially in hours of idleness, to be uncompromising in resisting allurements to sin and to divine protection, lest the foe, which could overcome so good and great a man, should prove too strong for us. It should teach us, too, that the way of peace for the sinner is the way David took, of humble repentance and submission to God.

In whose spirit there is no guile. There is really a blessing for the simple, direct, kindly nature, that the truly deceitful nature never gains. In Hawthorne's well-known story, the successful seekers for the great jewel are not the seeker who wanted to clasp it in his hand and have it buried with him; nor he who wanted to enhance his scientific reputation; nor he who wanted it only to sell it to the highest bidder; nor the poet who wanted it to hide in his attic chamber where his soul could drink in its radiance; nor the lord who desired to add it to the treasures in his ancestral halls that it might shed glory on his family heirlooms; but the simple couple who hoped to find it that they might show it to their neighbors, and might have its light glowing from the windows of their cottage.

When I kept silence my bones waxed old. Many a wrong-doer has had a similar experience, and has learned that confession must be made to relieve the unbearable suffering. In one of Miss Wilkins' beautiful stories the heroine has to confess a kindly fault to save her life or reputation. Her obstinate old husband had brought to death's door by disease, and had resolutely refused to take medicine. The old lady had saved his life by secretly mixing a certain drug with his food. For weeks he had taken the medicine with it, knowing it and he recovered. But the old lady's conscience reproached her for playing the trick upon him. She could not sleep, she could not eat, and her poor body shrank under her mental torture. Her bones waxed old by her grief. She found relief at last by telling him what she had done. He was so angry that he drove her from home. She took refuge with her sister, pining under the separation, but no longer stung by her conscience. One day she crawled back to the dear old home where she had lived for nearly fifty years, and pleaded with her husband to take her back. "You just go right back to your sister's this minute," said the old man sternly. She obeyed meekly but she did not have time to remove her bonnet, before she heard her husband's step at the door. He entered and walking up to her form said: "I've come to ask you to come home, Lucy."

Thou art my hiding place. A Boston journal tells the story of a young man who found a hiding place in his father's house. The young man fell in with evil associates, disgraced himself and ran away from home. His affectionate father searched for him, but could get no trace of him. Two years afterward he was in New York on business. One day he noticed a crowd following a policeman who was taking a prisoner to the station. One glance at the prisoner was sufficient. It was his son. He went to the young man's cell and putting his hand on his shoulder, said: "Henry, my boy." His kindness broke the young man's heart. "Can you forgive me, father?" he cried. Before the father left the cell he had a word of the son's difficulties. One man was hunting for him for an unpaid board bill; another for the cost of a window; and a valuable vase he had broken while intoxicated, and so on. The young man owned that he had made so many enemies that his life was a burden to him. "Come home with me, said the father the next day, when he had been around and settled the claims as far as he was able. The invitation was gladly accepted, and for the first time in months the son knew what peace was.

I will guide thee with mine eye. "I remember," says a Christian journal, "two homes of which I was an inmate a time in my young days. In one, the children were sulky, obstinate, and disobedient, and had to be often beaten. In the other there was peace and quiet. I have seen a child quelled by a look from the mother's eye, or brightened under her approving glance. I have seen her look through an open door and her child would anticipate her wish and run to close it." O yes, it is a happy thing for children and parents when the eye will do the work the chiding tongue.

of certain fearful consequences. There would be no more peace for him, the sword would not depart from his house; and from his own family would come trouble and sorrow and humiliation.

It is a sad story full of weighty lessons. One is sorry for the great king, who had endured so much hardship, and who had behaved so nobly under peculiarly trying circumstances, as we see him entering on his old age bowed with grief and shame under the weight of his guilt. All his dignity and wealth and glory were befouled with his horrible crime. Through all the remainder of his life he must go with the hideous stain upon him, his name in history tarnished, and his infamy never effaced. His power and influence, too, were maimed. His eldest son's sin must go unreproved because the young man could retort upon him with a reminder of his own guilt, and he must bear in meekness the insolence of Joab who had been his instrument in crime. The hour in which he yielded to temptation was fatal. Before he turned back he had caused his faithful servant to be put to death, and had put his future life in bondage. His fall ought to be a warning to every one to wherever there is a prison, reformatory, penitentiary, or other penal institution, there the Gospel is being preached to sinners, and free salvation through Jesus Christ is offered to perishing souls. Many persons who even give the prisons and convicts a passing thought, would doubtless be very much surprised if they visited a large State Prison, such as those at Auburn, Sing Sing, or Joliet, to learn from the chaplain and others of the remarkable Christian work that is accomplished among the prisoners, many of whom are incarcerated for a short time only while others are doomed to spend the remainder of their lives behind barred and bolted doors. Society is disposed to look harshly on those who have been convicted and sentenced to State Prison, and seldom stop to consider the fact that perhaps these unfortunates have been surrounded by better influences and better educated, they might not have been enrolled in the ranks of the criminals. Much is being done for the education and enlightenment of convicts, both by the State and private individuals so that, at the present time, schools and chapels are established and well attended in the prisons all over the country.

do not read, some do not care to, while others who would like to read, are foreigners, and the library does not contain books printed in their language. The libraries are under the personal supervision of the chaplains, and generally contain a very good assortment of books by standard authors. The Christian Herald has already been planned at different times, there is a great demand for good literature in all our prisons, and it is constantly growing, so that as many volumes are added to these libraries from time to time, as it is possible to obtain. Many of the prison libraries lack good books printed in foreign languages, which would be of great service to the prisoners.

School is usually held in the Protestant chapels of the State Prisons every week-day, and those who wish to attend are excused from work in the shops. There is a marked and general desire for education, and the school part of the daily routine is entered upon with much enthusiasm. It is the aim of the authorities to afford every possible facility for education, and in many cases, this results in well-educated Christian men being released from prison who, when they were convicted, could not read or write, and only knew the Bible by name.

There is a demand for the more advanced school books, including arithmetic, rhetoric, extemporaneous sermons and prayers, orchestral music, and hearty singing by the congregation. Many of the prisoners look forward with eager expectation to the Sunday morning gathering. Excellent music is furnished by a band of convict musicians, and many prisoners have been drawn to the Saviour through the medium of this Gospel singing. Convicts who are unfamiliar with the Word of God or the teachings of the Bible, and to whom the ordinary church service would have little significance, have been softened at heart by the strain of sacred song and led to Christ, when nothing else would have been effective. Some of the most hardened criminals have been won over, first through their love of music, and finally through the influence of the preached Gospel, and they are to-day devoted followers of the Master.

Communion is administered once every three months to the prisoners, and is attended by a group of earnest and devoted men, a majority being long-term prisoners. Some of the chaplains make a practice of visiting the communicants a few days be-

English grammar, science, geography, and others such as are commonly used in high school and first college grades. Wardens and chaplains take a deep interest in the school and render all the assistance possible in helping those who desire to improve themselves morally and intellectually. Warden O. V. Sage, of Sing Sing Prison, whose portrait is given in this issue, is specially interested in the religious and educational work that is going on among the convicts under his care. To those expressing a wish to do better, and who try to live up to it, he is always glad to lend a helping hand, however severe he may be in discipline.

Every Sunday morning, services are held in the Sing Sing Prison chapel, the congregation being always large, although the convicts are not compelled to attend. It is encouraging, however, to find that many do so of their own free will. The chapel cannot accommodate all who desire to attend divine worship, and as only 850 can be seated, two or three companies of fifty or sixty men in each are unable to get in the building. Fortunately, this state of affairs will last only a few months longer, as a new chapel is in course of erection which, when completed, will have a seating capacity of 1,500, with room for more benches, if necessary.

The Sunday service is very impressive, though simple, and includes brief, earnest, noon and teach a Bible class. The average attendance is about seventy-five, and after the meeting, the ladies talk to many of the convicts at their cell doors, pressing home the message of pardon and salvation. Occasionally, ministers of outside churches are invited to conduct Sunday morning service in the prison chapel. Prominent evangelists, godly men and women who are laboring in the outer vineyard, and sometimes prominent public men who have taken up the Christian life, speak words of cheer and encouragement to the convicts. Christian workers are always welcome in the prisons, and any influence that makes for good is, as a rule, greatly appreciated by warden, chaplain and convicts.

Rev. J. C. S. Weills, chaplain of Sing Sing Prison, New York, is an earnest and indefatigable worker for the salvation of the convicts. Some of the most noted criminals imprisoned at Sing Sing in recent years have been drawn by his influence to become fellow-workers for the good of others. Whether the men be educated or ignorant, Chaplain Weills exercises the same patient, thoughtful and prayerful solicitude for all who show a desire to be led to better things and a purer life. He is an Episcopalian, but as a State officer his work covers a broad field, and is necessarily undenominational in its character. It is the aim of all chaplains to avoid sectarianism, as far as possible, so that nothing may be permitted to interfere with the success of the spiritual work among the prisoners. Chaplain Weills is beloved by the men, and to many of them stands in the relation of a close friend and intimate adviser. He is constantly going about among them on his mission of kindly advice, and his godly influence and example have been very fruitful in the past few years. By mingling with the prisoners, by entering into their daily life and by taking a real interest in all their affairs, he has been made instrumental in transforming many checkered lives and leading darkened souls into the light. On the door of his office, Chaplain Weills has arranged a small box, through which he receives from forty to fifty notes each week from the prisoners, asking for personal interviews. This privilege is always granted, fore the service, and talking with them, so that they may know the spiritual condition of each prisoner. This short talk has frequently held and strengthened those who otherwise might have been inclined to moody seclusion, but who are thus encouraged to openly declare their allegiance to Christ. In all the prisons, there are to be found earnest followers of the Saviour, who experience a special pleasure in being present at the Communion service.

In many of the towns near which State Prisons are located, there are bands of Christian workers, made up of members from the congregations of the various churches in the locality, who pay regular evangelistic visits to the prisons. Some noble work is done through these means. At Sing Sing there is a band of Christian women who, on the last Sunday of each month, visit the prison in the after-

About two years ago, a wave of revival passed through Sing Sing prison and many were converted. For a long while afterward, a number of the convicts held daily prayer meetings in one of the shops at noon-time, until the principal members were either discharged or other duties interfered with the gatherings. Some noticeable cases of religious awakenings have occurred recently in the prison, and to-day there are those who, though incarcerated for life, are yet contented and happy in their confinement, and fully resigned to it, having taken the Saviour as their Guide and Master, and through him seeking to help those about them to do his bidding. Such prisoners are very helpful to the wardens and chaplains. In some cases they are granted privileges that are well-deserved.

GLIMPSE OF A CONVICT'S CELL.

There have also been some remarkable instances of religious awakening among the prisoners condemned to death. For days before the execution, the chaplains have been in constant attendance upon the unfortunates. Rarely is the death penalty inflicted without the convict expressing some degree of contrition, and a desire that his soul may be saved, and that he may find Christ and through him, forgiveness for his sins.

The effect of punishment varies according to the disposition and temperament of the prisoner. It is noticeable, however, that there is a marked improvement in many, perhaps to a greater degree in those who are confined for a long term than among the short-term prisoners. In recent years, prison hardships have been lessened, many of the severe and unnecessary modes of punishment have been abolished, and in a majority of the prisons, kindness has taken the place of harshness. Humane treatment has been found to work better than the old, severe methods of punishment, so that convicts who are orderly and behave themselves, are treated well; but the obstreperous ones are summarily dealt with and are usually confined in dark cells until they submit to the discipline. This latter mode of punishment is not frequently inflicted, however, as convicts would rather work than be locked up in the dark cells, where they are allowed nothing to eat but bread and water. As a class, the convicts desire to conform to the prison regulations, and one of their greatest hardships is to be deprived of the little freedom they enjoy within the prison walls, while at work.

It is everywhere apparent that the religious and humanitarian influences which have been active in recent years in behalf of the inmates of the various State Prisons have wrought remarkable changes in a multitude of convicts. Very many of them, in after life, have shown to the world that their work in the prison was a substantial and enduring one and that their punishment had been turned into blessing.

"The Fountain of the Virgin."

One of the Familiar Scenes of Christ's Boyhood, as it Appears To-day.

NEXT to Bethlehem and Jerusalem, the scenes of the birth and death of Jesus, there is no place more sacred to the devout traveler in Palestine than the little village of Nazareth, where the early childhood of the Redeemer was passed and where, according to the sacred chronicle, "he was brought up." It is a beautiful village and has apparently suffered little at the hand of time, which has laid hundreds of other places, greater in size and importance, in utter ruin. Yet it has not been without its vicissitudes, for it has been a battle ground for Christians and Mohammedans, one of the most remarkable episodes being the defeat of 25,000 Moslems by 2000 French troops under Bonaparte. Visitors admire the beautiful situation of the village, which stands on a great, green slope, embosomed amid the surrounding hills.

To the inquiring pilgrim, the central point of interest in Nazareth is the "Fountain of the Virgin," which tradition declares to be the same well that existed in the days when Mary, the wife of Joseph, used to come there with the other women of the village, to draw water. Then, as now, the children often came with their mothers, and the boy Jesus, was doubtless among them at times. It is the only well in Nazareth and has been the only well in three thousand years. It stands at one end of the village in a delightfully cool spot, surrounded by olive groves and wide, pleasant spaces. Two or three persons can draw water at once, and it frequently happens, in the early morning, that a dozen or more are waiting their turn to dip their pitchers in the deep basin.

In Nazareth, as in Bethlehem, the traditions concerning the sacred places are well preserved. Any intelligent Nazarene will point out unhesitatingly "the Fountain of the Virgin," and its authenticity seems to be nowhere disputed. Over the fountain is a substantial arch, which has doubtless been repaired at different times during the centuries, and in front is a stout stone wall around which one must pass in order to descend the steps leading to the well. Here the Nazareth matrons and maidens set down their stone jars to rest and gossip a moment, just as other Nazarene women doubtless did centuries ago, when they came to draw water of a morning. Dressed in the bright-hued garments of which Oriental women are peculiarly fond; veiled (for the Moslem population is in the minority in Nazareth), and with bare, rounded arms, whose strength makes light of the great porous jars, they dip the vessels in the cool depths of the well, carry them easily to the head and then walk off under the burden with a gait a princess might envy. Here and there may be seen a Moslem woman with veiled face and head, and a veil. Men, too, come to the Fountain, with their thirsty pack-mules to drink, and the little children clinging to their mothers' skirts, peer curiously into the cavern-like gloom of the great well and listen in wonder to the echoes it gives back in response to the chatter and gossip of the women.

The whole scene, the picturesque groupings, the richly-colored dresses of the Nazareth women and the characteristic surroundings, have been faithfully reproduced by our artist in the colored illustration on the first page of this issue.

A Titled Christian Lady.

There are few persons engaged in religious work in Vienna, and indeed, throughout Austria, who are not familiar with the remarkable story of the Baroness Langeau and her devotion to Christian work in the face of the bitterest opposition. This lady belongs to one of the leading families of Austria. For many years her husband represented his country at the Court of St. Petersburg, and his wife lived a life of pleasure givety at the Russian Capital. But a change came; the husband died and then the only son and the votary of pleasure was inconsolable. She found no comfort in any of the things she had before been absorbed in, and she realized how wretched a solace the world and its vanities are to a wounded heart. How she came into the light and joy of a new faith is best told in her own words:

"My days were taken up with good works; I toiled and slaved looking down upon others who were not as strict about teaching and doctrine; but the whole time my heart was as wretched as could be. A deep sense of sin bowed me down, and I felt on the verge of despair. For years and years I had been told that Jesus was the Saviour of the world, that he was always willing to save, but not I was told for the first time that he will not save us without our own consent:

that he invites and entreats, but we must decide. At last my eyes were opened. I surrendered my will, I trusted, and was saved."

The Baroness came out into a new and gracious experience. To one who had so long been devoted to pleasure and had known only the form of religion, all this was strange and enrapturing. But her new faith was to be at once tried as by fire. The little Lutheran Church with which she was connected was sorely persecuted and finally the building was closed. She then threw open the doors of her baronial palace and for fifteen months the congregation assembled there to hear the Word preached and to enjoy the fellowship of the saints.

The Baroness had outgeneraled the official opposition. No policeman dared to enter her palace; the little society was able to worship in peace, with none to make its members afraid. At length she built a spacious and attractive hall and presented it to the society. The Baroness superintends the Sunday School and also the deaconess work. The depth of her interest in the cause is seen in her personal efforts and material contributions. On one occasion she sold jewels to the value of $10,000 and contributed the whole amount to the society. Rev. R. Moeller, the pastor, speaks of the Baroness in these words: "She is a real warm-hearted Christian. She will help me in everything, and every progress in God's work makes her glad."

Praise Him.

BECAUSE in this world there is sorrow,
Because in this world there is care,
Because hid from view is the morrow,
Because the clouds float here and there,
We oft close our hearts to the sunlight,
But open them wide to the gloom.
Oh, let us dwell less on the midnight!
To thoughts rich with blessing give room!
The birds all around us are singing;
O, list to their songs full of cheer!
The grass and the flowers are springing—Creator, thou surely art near!
Oh, then let us render him praises,
Along with the birds, grass, and flowers:
And work while to him our song rises:
And joy, peace and love shall be ours!

THE STRUGGLE IN CRETE.

Foremost among European topics at the present time, the situation in Crete continues to absorb attention abroad. There is no apparent disposition on the part of Turkey to modify the policy of persecution and the religious hatred which turned the once peaceful and prosperous island into a region of massacre and pillage. Although Turkey seems resolved to employ, if necessary, its entire military and naval resources for the suppression of the insurrection, it is not now probable that Europe will stand tamely by and permit the frightful atrocities of Armenians to be reproduced, even on a smaller scale, in this new fanatical Moslem crusade. Sympathy with Crete is apparently growing. The friendship of Greece and of the Hellenic people generally has been so pronounced, that it will now be difficult for King George and his government to withhold their assurances of sympathy, even at the request of the Powers, who are usually, afraid to open the irrepressible "Eastern Question," in an acute form, interposing between the Porte and its victims. It is not probable, however, in an event that Turkey will be allowed to proceed to extreme measures. Almost every part of Crete of any consequence is commanded by the warships of England, France, Germany, and Russia that lie at anchor off the Cretan coast, and even the most bloodthirsty of the Sultan's generals would scarcely venture in any that would invite their intervention. During a temporary panic at Canea, late boatloads of armed marines were landed promptly from the British, French, and German men-of-war, for the purpose of preserving order and presumably of averting massacre. What might have occurred had not such timely help been at hand may be left to conjecture. Canea would have been a second Trebizond, its streets running with Christian blood.

Bibles in the Street.

An interesting personage who recently attended the Lutheran Joint Synod of Ohio, and adjacent States, which was held in Masillon, Ohio, is Rev. A. R. Krodd of Allegheny. He was born of Hebrew parentage in Russia. At the age of nineteen, through curiosity, he was prompted to pick up a fragment of the New Testament, which had been translated into the Hebrew language by Professor Delitzsch. At that time Testaments were being distributed among the Russian Jews by missionaries, and were promptly thrown in the street. Kroddell became interested and went to a Lutheran pastor in Russia for instructions, and was finally baptized. Being disowned by his parents he was sent to Germany to college. He thoroughly mastered the German language in a year. He then came to Columbus, Ohio, where he entered the Theological Seminary and was graduated a minister. He is now at the head of the Jewish mission work carried on by the Lutheran Synod and is very successful.

THE NEGLECTED CONTINENT.

A "Christian Herald" Correspondent's Journey Through South America—The Giant Mountain Ranges—Social and Religious Condition of the People.

A VACQUERO.

Two years ago, Mr. J. G. King, of Newark, N. J., left New York for Buenos Ayres, intending to take a protracted tour for the benefit of his health. After spending some two months at Buenos Ayres and Rosario de Fe in Argentina, South America, he set to push forward, not following the regular lines of travel. He took the first canvas canoe ever seen on the Parana river, in which he coasted the river to Corrientes, near which point he crossed the Paraguay river, and coasted to Asuncion, stopping at a few villages on the way. He diverged from his course several times to explore for a considerable distance the smaller rivers flowing into the Parana, among them the Tipucara, Virapicamayo the two latter flowing from the unexplored Gran Chaco inhabited by Indians only. He spent considerable time at Asuncion.

Leaving Asuncion in May, he coasted the river Parana to its head-waters, passing many days exploring its tributaries, the San Pedro, Cuyaba and Tres Rios Rivers. Cuyaba, Matto Grosso, Curumbá and Luis were each visited, all being places of note in Central South America. He had many adventures with Indians, tigers, boa constrictors, etc. In returning, his canoe sank and he lost everything except his camera and a life-preserver for floating five hours swimming in the river. He was rescued by an Indian of a cannibal tribe, and spent one month with the tribe. He then secured passage to Curumbá on an Indian trading canoe, and took steamer at Curumbá to Asuncion, thence south to Rosario from which he crossed the Continent to Valparaíso, and there crossed the Andes to Valparaíso, in Chili. On Jan. 12th, he left Valparaíso on steamer for New York, whence he returned to New York.

Mr. King traveled by canoe alone a distance of upwards of 4000 miles. Together with his journeys by steamer, horse-back and mule-back, makes a personal narrative of travel, observation and adventure, most interesting. His narrative, written by himself, is as follows:

At the very outset I cannot forbear saying that it is quite surprising that little mission work is being done in South America by our Protestant Missions, the more so as it lies at the threshold of our own land. Out of the two hundred and sixty-five mission societies at work in the world to-day, only sixteen are represented in the South American field. I find that all the spiritual workers of the continent, counting clerics, laymen, women, wives and daughters of the workers, will not exceed four hundred to a population of 37,000,000 souls. It is a vast and woefully neglected continent.

Think of it! Seven million square miles of area, containing one-eighth of the population of the earth's surface, and the greatest most magnificent river drainage in the world; eighteen thousand miles around the coast line, and two Rocky mountain ranges of extraordinary magnitude and beauty. It is appropriately called, spiritually, "The Neglected Continent." Romanism there is only another name for idolatry, and its followers, as far as I can see, are naught but idolaters.

While at Guayaquil, in Ecuador, I had an opportunity to gather some data relating to mission work in that Republic. I found that since the recent Revolution (1895), many of the priests have been compelled to leave the country, being implicated in the disruption. There is no doubt that this has been the most priest-ridden of all the republics. President Alfaro is said to be more liberal and fearless than any of his predecessors in religious matters, making it possible that Protestant missions may be entertained, if founded, during his administration, with more liberal sentiments. At present, Protestant Bibles are declared contraband and not allowed to pass the custom house. No books or papers can be published which the Church does not advise. No mission has attempted to work in Ecuador, until within the last few months, when two young Englishmen attempted to open the way at Quito, the capital, and La Paz, but met with opposition so strong that they were forced to leave the country. Quito has a population of 30,000 souls. The whole population of Ecuador is estimated at 2,000,000.

Some people form a very flattering idea of the work done by the Catholic missions, among the Indians of Ecuador, but I am informed that as yet nothing has been done here that is really being done. I find only one Protestant missionary in Venezuela, nearly six hundred thousand square miles in area, 2,200,000 population. Colombia, more than three times as large as Japan—504,740 square miles—four million people, and only three mission stations of the American Presbyterian Church, although free worship was sanctioned ten years ago. The Republic suppressed all Roman Catholic seminaries in 1872. Ecuador has no mission at present and never has had any work done there except that which was done by the two young English laymen within the last few months. As far as known it is thoroughly unevangelized as yet. There are here from one to two million people, and the country covers 157,000 square miles—much larger than Great Britain and Ireland. Peru with its three millions has only two mission centres.

advances make her especially open to evangelization. Chili is the foremost of all the Republics in enterprise and intelligence, and asserted her independence of Spain in 1818. She expelled the Papal Nuncio, suppressed an attempt of the clergy to incite revolution; carried the triumph of the liberal party through both houses of Congress, enacted important civil reforms and declared the complete and final separation of Church and State.

Argentina and Patagonia, now reckoned as one republic, contain a population of over four millions. They have four stations and nine workers of the South American Missionary Society, a few independent, and Salvation Army workers, and three stations of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States. Paraguay, whose population has been decimated by the wars brought on by the tyrant Lopez, now numbers about four hundred thousand, and of that number there are one hundred and forty thousand uncivilized Indians. Here the South American Missionary Society has one station and six workers, and the American Methodist Episcopal Church with a group of native workers, an average of one foreign missionary to eighty thousand people.

Uruguay, the smallest of the South American Republics (area, 72,110 square miles and a population of 750,000), has two mission stations of Methodist Episcopal and South American Missionary Society, one each to 375,000 souls. Brazil, with its area of 3,209,878 square miles, occupying nearly one-half the area of South America, and a population of sixteen millions, has only eight American missions, one missionary probably to every 138,000 souls. Of its sixteen million people, at least fourteen millions are still unevangelized.

In contrast with South America, the northern part of this new world—puritan, prosperous, powerful, and progressive—presents probably the most remarkable evidence earth affords of the blessings of Protestantism. The results of Romanism left to itself are written large in letters of gloom across priest-ridden, superstitious South America. They bring forcibly to and intelligently adapted to their needs. The traders here, generally foreigners, are unprincipled. They go among the aborigines, who easily become their victims, extorting from and robbing them. There is no more fitting term than to say they are utterly demoralized.

Among the native men, faith in the Roman priests is very small, but the women are easily led like meek lambs. There are tribes, but only a few in South America, who have become so greatly decimated and degenerated, that to bring them into a state of civilization would be almost impossible. They, too, have their mysterious spirits whom they propitiate and worship. On the other hand, there are tribes that possess intellectual faculty and physical strength that would make them powerful if brought into a state of civilization and industry in keeping with Christian nations. Rev. Dr. Wood, Callao, says:

"There are millions of aborigines retaining the peculiarities that characterized them before the European conquest, modified by a steady degeneration ever since that time, until this region, from being the brightest in all the Western Hemisphere, morally and religiously, has become the darkest and hardest to reform. But the time is apparently near for a great awakening, and when it comes, the movement will take in the three Republics of Peru, Bolivia and Ecuador—the land of the Incas—with a grand sweep." Protestant worship in Peru and Bolivia must now be conducted with closed doors and in Ecuador Protestant worship is not even tolerated. In other South American Republics worship is allowed, but not encouraged.

Glance at these Republics and see what tion. The priests are using every means to hinder the preaching of the Word. One of the Protestant Churches is located at Lima and the other at Callao.

Bolivia has a population of a million and a half; an enormous inland Republic, almost six hundred thousand square miles in area. Except by a very few passing visitors from colporteurs of the American Bible Society, nothing has been done. There is no Protestant missionary station established.

Chili has a population of 3,300,000, including 500,000 Indians. There are working there twenty-four men and thirty-seven women, including a group of Bishop Taylor's mission teachers. The American Presbyterians have four stations and thirteen missionaries, and the South American Missionary Society with three stations worked by two chaplains, one layman and some ladies. This is the loveliest climate in the world and Chili's recent political mind the emphatic language of Scripture:

Many shepherds have destroyed my vineyards, they have trodden my portion under foot. They have made my pleasant portions a desolate wilderness. They have made it a desolation: it mourneth unto me, saying, I have been forsaken, because no man layeth it to heart.

Next month we expect to resume the regular publication of our colored front pages. At this writing, our new color-printing facilities are nearly perfect, and we can confidently promise artistic results in the near future, far surpassing anything hitherto reached in this line.

Christian Work.

AN enterprising Church will not hold back its help from any good cause. It will send its members down through the dark lanes, and into squalid cellars, and among pestiferous fumes, to prophesy in God's name over the riven, scalded, mangled, and decaying carcasses of the morally dead. It will send its box of clothing to the colporteur in the West, and with its prayers help fill the sails of the clipper that carries Christian missionaries to Japan. It will rejoice over a blind girl taught to read in the asylum, and the throwing open of heathen ports to the Gospel. It will teach the black boy in the Sabbath class his A, B, C, and pray that Ethiopia may soon stretch forth her hands to God. It will light a taper in a sick man's room, and by prayer help roll up the Sun of righteousness to the noonday glory of the millennium. The prayer-meeting of such a Church will be crowded with worshippers, and long, dull prayers will be cut off at both ends, and set on fire in the middle. The psalmody will be buoyant and rapturous; old "Coronation" will ring out as though all the crowns of heaven were that moment thrown down at the feet of Jesus.

The field is white to the harvest! Men with the sickles, come on and lay to the work! In this age of the world, with so many Gospel advantages, and so many grand incentives to work, a dead Church ought to be indicted as a nuisance. Invention and discovery have quickened the world's pace. The age, no more a-foot, is on wheels and wings. Quiet villages have been roused up by the hum of machinery, the clatter of looms, and the shriek of steam-whistles. We rise, after a short night's sleep, and find that the world has advanced mighty leagues. The pulse of the world beats stronger, the arm of industrious achievement strikes harder, the eye of human ingenuity sees farther, the heart of Christian philanthropy throbs warmer. The earth shakes under the quick tread of scientific, moral, and religious enterprises. In such a time, a torpid, lethargic, timid Church is both a farce and a blasphemy. If it do not march when God commands it to march; if it do not strike when God commands it to strike; if, when the mountains round about are full of horses and chariots of fire, it shrinks back from the conflict, God will mark it for ruin, and Christians will become inconsistent, and the minister will sleep in the pulpit, and the choir will quarrel in the gallery, and the shingles will rot, and sinners will perish, and the cause of God will be dishonored. One enterprising Church! How many tracts it might scatter! How many hungry mouths it might feed! How many poor churches it might help! How many lights it might kindle!

Bright Homes.

MAKE your home the brightest place on earth if you would charm your children into the high path of rectitude and religion. Do not always have the blinds turned the wrong way. Let God's light, that puts gold on the gentian and spots the pansy, stream into your windows. Do not expect your children to keep step to a dead march. Do not cover up your walls with West's "Death on the Pale Horse," and Tintoretto's "Massacre of the Innocents," but rather let there be on your walls some simpler pictures—"The Hawking Party," "The Old Mill, by the Mountain Stream," "The Fox Hunt," "The Harvest Scene," "The Children Amid Flowers," and "Saturday Night Marketing." Get you no lesson of cheerfulness from grasshopper's leap, and lamb's frisk, and squirrel's chatter, and quail's whistle, and garrulous streamlet which, from the rock on the mountain-top to the meadow fern under the shadow of the steep, comes looking for the steepest place to leap off at, and talking just for the sake of hearing itself talk? If all the skies hurtled in thunder tempest, and storms perpetually wandered across the sea, and all the streams were raving mad, frothing at the mouth with mud foam, and there were eternal simoons, throbbing among the hills, and the world had neither lark's carol, nor hummingbird's trill, nor water-fall's dash, but only bear's bark, and panther's scream, and wolf's howl—then you would do well to bother and plague yourself all through life, gathering around you only the shadows; but when God has strewn our path with so many blessings, it is high time we took into our homes more of the brightness, more of the innocent hilarity, more of the good cheer. A dark home makes bad boys and bad girls to be bad men and bad women.

Wide-awake Prayer-meetings.

ONE of the grandest results of the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting is the fact that all the devotional services of the country have been revolutionized. The tap of the bell of that historic prayer-meeting has shortened the prayers and exhortations of the Church universal. But since it has become the custom to throw open the meeting for remark and exhortation, there has been a jubilee among the religious bores who wander around pestering the churches. They talk long and loud in proportion as they have nothing to say. They empty on us several bushels of "Ohs" and "Ahs." But they seldom get a chance, for we never throw the meetings open when they are there. We make such a close hedge of hymns and prayers that they cannot break into the garden. One of them we are free of, because one night, seeing him wiggle-waggle in his seat as if about to rise, we sent an elder to him to say that his remarks were not acceptable. The elder blushed and halted a little when we gave him the mission, but setting his teeth together he started for the offensive brother, leaned over the back of the pew and discharged the duty. We have never seen that brother since, but once, in the street, and then he was looking the other way. By what right such men go about in ecclesiastical vagabondism to spoil the peace of devotional meetings, it is impossible to tell. Either that nuisance must be abated or we must cease to "throw open" our prayer-meetings for exhortations.

Hot Weather Religion.

IT takes more grace to be an earnest and useful Christian in summer than in any other season. The very destitute, through lack of fuel and thick clothing, may find the winter the trying season; but those comfortably circumstanced find summer the Thermopylae that tests their Christian courage and endurance. The spring is suggestive of God and heaven, and a resurrection day. That eye must be blind that does not see God's footstep in the new grass, and hear his voice in the call of the swallow at the eaves. In the white blossoms of the orchards we find suggestion of those whose robes have been made white in the blood of the Lamb. A June morning is a door opening into heaven. So autumn mothers a great many moral and religious suggestions. The season of corn husking, the gorgeous woods that are becoming the catafalque of the dead year remind the dullest of his own fading and departure. But summer fatigues and weakens, and no man keeps his soul in as desirable a frame unless by positive resolution and especial implorations. Pulpit and pew often get stupid together, and ardent devotion is adjourned until September. But who can afford to lose two months out of each year when the years are so short and so few. He who stops religious growth in July and August will require the next six months to get over it. Nay, he never recovers. At the season, when the fields are most full of leafage and life, let us not be lethargic and stupid.

Comfort for the Weakly.

THERE is a constant sympathy expressed by robust people for those of slight physical constitution. We think the sympathy ought to turn in the opposite direction. It is the delicate people who escape the most fearful disorders, and in three cases out of four, live the longest. These gigantic structures are almost always reckless of health. They say, "nothing hurts me," so they stand in the draughts and go out into the night air to cool off, and eat crabs at midnight, and doff their flannels in April, and carelessly get their feet wet.

But the delicate people are shy of peril. They know that disease has been fishing for them for twenty years, and they keep away from the hook. No trout can be caught if he sees the shadow of the sportsman on the brook. These people whom everybody expects to die, live on most tenaciously.

We know of a young lady who evidently married a very wealthy man of eighty-five years, on the ground he was very delicate, and with reference to her one-third. But the aged invalid is so careful of his health, and the young wife so reckless of hers, that it is now uncertain whether she will inherit his storehouses, or he inherit her wedding-rings.

Health and longevity depend more upon caution and intelligent management of one's self than upon original physical outfit. Paul's advice to the sheriff is appropriate to people in all occupations: "Do thyself no harm!"

The Glorious Church.

LOOK upon the Church of God as one vast hosanna. Joy dripping from the baptismal font, joy glowing in the sacramental cup, joy warbling in the anthem, joy beating against the gate of heaven with a hallelujah like the voice of mighty thunderings. Beautiful for situation! The joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion. It is the day and the place where Christ reviews his troops, bringing them out in companies and regiments and brigades, riding along the line, examining the battle-torn flags of past combat, and cheering them on to future victories. Oh, the joy of Christian assemblage!

BRIEF NOTES.

Gen. O. O. Howard was Elected President of the Congregational Home Missionary Society at the recent annual meeting of the Society at Haver, Conn.

At Huddersfield, England, a Vote of the ratepayers was taken on the question of surface cars on Sundays. The result was against Sunday cars, and 2725 in favor.

Bishop Temple of London is Authority for the statement that during the past quarter of a century four hundred million dollars have been expended for religious purposes by members of the Episcopal Church.

The Christian Intelligencer states that a recent meeting in Berlin, when the question of infidelity was under discussion it was voted that, out of 275 noted scientists, only 4 were atheists, 219 were deists, and 90 Bible Christians.

It is Proposed to Celebrate the Fourteenth anniversary of the birth of Philip W. Anderson, which occurs February 16th, 1897, by publishing a Melancthon Museum in his native town of Bretten, Baden.

Evangelist W. A. Bodell of Crawford, Ind., has been engaged to assist in the evangelistic campaign in Philadelphia, under the leadership of J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., during the months of November and December.

Dr. R. S. Storrs, President of the African Methodist Episcopal Board, and pastor of the Church of the Redeemed, Brooklyn, will celebrate in November the fiftieth anniversary of his pastorate. Subsequent to a testimonial to be presented to him amounting to twenty thousand dollars.

The Recent Baptist Young People's Convention at Milwaukee is said to have the largest gathering of Baptists the world has ever seen. There were eight thousand delegates in attendance beside visitors. The next convention will be held in Brooklyn, N. Y., July, 1897.

Evangelist John H. Elliott held a Series of Union Evangelistic meetings at Tacoma, Wash., June, which have led to a large gathering. At the recent communion of the First Presbyterian Church forty-one accessions were announced and other churches have benefited largely.

As a Result of the Series of Meetings at Cherokee, Iowa, in May, under the direction of Evangelist Williams, the churches have been largely revived, and large accessions of members made. The Presbyterian Church alone received sixty new members.

Bishop H. C. Potter of New York has Received from the Archbishop of Canterbury an invitation to take part in the preliminary meetings of the Lambeth Conference, which is to be held in London. The preliminary meetings are to arrange the programme and formulate rules of procedure, and to be held this fall.

The Total Expenses of the Recent General Conference at Cleveland, including traveling and hotel expenses of delegates, and of fraternal delegates, printing, stationery, were $62,685. The receipts were made up of donations from the churches, and rent of buildings, chairs, and aggregated $64,790, showing a net in the treasury of over $2,100.

Among the Speakers at the Recent Session of the Evangelical Alliance, besides those of American and England, were Count Bernadotte of Bylandt, of The Hague; Mr. Millan, from Armenia; and Prof. Szabo, of Pesth. Dr. Sinclair, Archbishop of London, commended the delegates in a speech which he read in English, French, and German.

A well-known Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church was being entertained at a banquet by a famous European statesman. The conversation turned on the private character of the nation which controlled the policy of the chief nations of the world. The statesman said: "If the people of a nation knew the men by whom their affairs were governed they would rise in a body and hang them all."

Rev. John Watson, D.D., who is well known by his literary non-de-plume, Mr. Watson is coming to this country to lecture. Mr. Watson, of New York, who manages his lectures, says he is in greater demand than any foreigner who has come here, not even excepting Stanley, and most of the fifty-five appointments for the tour which he will give on this side the water have been made.

The Presbytery of Philadelphia has adopted final action in the case of Dr. A. T. Pierson, who was recently baptized by immersion at Dr. J. A. McGowan's church in England. The Presbytery adopted a resolution, erasing the name of Dr. Pierson from the roll of membership, and afterwards, at Dr. Pierson's request, adopted a paper, expressing confidence in his Christian character and his doctrinal soundness, except in the matter of baptism.

Rev. Sam Mead of Malange, Angolacknowledging a contribution from the readers of the Christian Herald toward the expenses of his trip, says that he has now forty children on his training up for Christ. He might have said that he had possessed the means. He adds that his work is great and our number is few. He says with patience the time when the natives will cost so much in life and money, to teach will be worth the Gospel to others.

The Observance of the Lord's Day as a day of rest is increasing in France. The Paris Convention for Sunday rest has enrolled over 4000 members. Many shops are closed on Sunday, including the great Magnan de Louvre. In the army Sunday is a day of rest, and contractors are not now allowed to work on that day. In Lyons there are more than 2000 shops and stores closed entirely on Sunday. This is the more gratifying because for many years France has been a leader in the bad practice of Sunday desecration.

The World's Women's Christian Temperance Union is sending out another round the world missionary. Miss Clara Parrish, of Paris, Ill., is ranged to begin her work this month. She is from San Francisco, Aug. 26, on the steamer Coptic, stopping at the Hawaiian Islands and proceeding thence to Japan. The next mission is probably to be sent from the W. C. T. U. of New York, 424 West 42nd street, New York, and will be eastward, thus beginning the circuit of the world in each direction.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Recognition at Ferkeh.

LATER reports by mail of the fight at Ferkeh in the Soudan, show that the engagement was more serious and may prove more important than the cable account indicated. The Egyptian forces, under the command of the English General, H. Kitchener, having strengthened their position at Akasheh, made a further advance to Ferkeh, sixteen miles distant, where a strong body of the Khalifa's troops was encamped. The main body of infantry and artillery proceeded by the direct route along the river bank, while a force of cavalry, camelry, and horse artillery took a circuitous route across the desert and occupied the heights commanding the town of Ferkeh. The march of the divisions was silent, and, during the latter part, in the darkness before dawn, Ferkeh was reached at five in the morning of June 6. There was a simultaneous attack, followed by two and a half hours of hard fighting. The town was obstinately defended, and even when defence was obviously hopeless and the bulk of the Khalifa's troops had fled, the huts were still filled with armed men who refused to surrender and died fighting. It was learned that prior to the attack the Khalifa had preached to the army, assuring the men that he was divinely inspired, and that he was commissioned by heaven to take possession of the whole region, and hold that land Egypt itself in the name of the prophet. He said it had been revealed to him that the end of the infidels had come; cholera had enfeebled their force, and the swords of the faithful would make a speedy end of the remainder. He was authorized to promise an immediate entry into Paradise to any who might die in the conflict. The killed numbered out nine hundred, and the prisoners out five hundred. The unarmed population received the conquerors joyfully. They reported that the oppression of the Khalifa and his officers had been barbarous, and had produced discontent throughout the Soudan. Many of the prisoners declared that they had been forced to fight for the Khalifa, and gladly accepted the offer to join the Egyptian army. They are amazed to see Col. Slatin among the victors. They knew him at once, and remembered his long captivity among them. They saluted him with a deference amusingly in contrast with their treatment of him when he was a poor prisoner in the Khalifa's power. One incident in which Slatin was concerned is sketched in the picture from which our illustration is reproduced. Going over the field after the battle, Slatin came upon a corpse that he recognized. It was that of Emir Hammur, one of the chief officers of the Khalifa, who had been Slatin's bitter enemy during the whole eleven years of his slavery. His hands were clenched as if in passion, and a look of vindictive hate was still on his dead features. A more agreeable experience for Slatin was the finding among the wounded of Emir Tahir el Obeid, one of the very few of the Khalifa's officers who had befriended him. Slatin was glad to see him, and had him removed to the hospital, and saw that his wounds received skilful treatment. The wounded man learned by experience that kindness shown to some one who is miserable may receive an unexpected reward. The time coming when many will make the same discovery:

Then shall the righteous answer: Lord when saw I thee sick or in prison and came unto thee? And the King shall say unto them: Verily, I say to you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me. (Matt. 25: 37-40.)

Shoes for Passengers.

A railroad official relates the cause of an item of expenditure which is unusual in running expenses. It appears that, some time ago, the passengers on a certain train, which reached Chicago in the morning hours, found themselves without shoes. It was the duty of the employees to go through the cars, collect the shoes, shine them and restore them to their places. The shining operation was usually done in the rear car, which on the train from St. Paul, Minn., was added at La Crosse and dropped at Milwaukee. The boys duly collected the shoes on this occasion, but fell asleep while they were polishing them and were asleep when the car in which they and the shoes were, was dropped at Milwaukee. When, therefore, the passengers wanted to go about their business in Chicago on their arrival, they learned to their consternation that their shoes were many miles away. As the misadventure was clearly due to the fault of the Company's servants and there might be actions for damages for delay, the Company sent for a shoe-dealer who supplied each shoeless passenger with a pair of new shoes at the Company's expense. They must have been glad to have been so promptly and completely relieved of their difficulty. It may be hoped that when they come to the end of their journey of life, when they and all others, not by mistake, but by inexorable law, arrive denuded of the body itself, they will find themselves supplied with that glorious body for which the Apostle hoped: Desiring to be clothed upon with our habitation which is from heaven. Not that we would be unclothed but clothed upon that mortality might be swallowed up of life. (II. Cor. 5: 2.)

Selected Subjects.

Complaint is made in a New York journal by a visitor to the city of the treatment he has received in some of the photographic studios. He was anxious to obtain a first-class photograph of himself, and applied to one of the best operators in the city whose name is famous here and in Europe. He knew the price would be high, but he was willing to pay it. To his surprise, however, the artist declined to take the portrait, and another artist to whom he applied turned him over to his assistant. The reason assigned for the treatment is that photography has become so much of an art that the experts in it devote their time only to selected subjects. One of these men, who has a public, is extremely exclusive as regards his own work. This photographer has refused to take photographs of about half the people who have presented themselves at his studio. He says that his time is too valuable, and that he can only devote himself to people who are good subjects. The photographer's object is to make good pictures which he cannot do with subjects whose features are coarse or commonplace. We may be thankful that there is no such restriction in spiritual matters. It is to the glory of Christ that the most beautiful results of his work are made out of the vilest material. Under his picture of corrupt evildoers the Apostle writes to the saints:

Such were some of you; but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God. (I. Cor. 6: 11.)

A Yale Student's Dilemma.

An indignant letter from a student of Yale University appears in a New York journal. During his vacation he is spending a good deal of his time in bicycling. One morning recently he rose at dawn and went for a spin up Riverside Drive. After a ride of several miles from the city he began to feel very hungry and was glad to see a hotel in the distance. He ran his machine into the yard and put it in charge of one of the employees. Then he went into the hotel and made his way to the restaurant to get breakfast. But he was stopped at the door by a waiter, who with many apologies, told him it was against the rules of the house to go into the restaurant without a coat. The Yale man was wearing a clean white flannel shirt tastefully embroidered, which, in his opinion, looked better than any coat. He protested that he must have his breakfast and was too far away from home to get his coat and insisted on going in. The waiter, however, was firm. He said that as so many bicyclists came there in a similar dress, the proprietor had laid in a stock of coats of all sizes. If the gentleman would choose one to suit him he was welcome to the use of it while he ate his breakfast. The young man indignantly refused to put on a coat that might have been worn by any dirty guest the day before. The waiter was sorry. He could do nothing else. The man told her she would have to seek new quarters. Being pressed for the reason she replied that the boarders had noticed that she did not wear a wedding ring, and had inferred from the fact that she was not married. The lady was deeply hurt by the suspicion. She explained that she and her husband were very poor when they were married, and had no money to spare for a ring. Since that time their circumstances had improved, but their expenses also had increased, so that the ring appeared to be one of the superfluities they could get along without. She produced her marriage certificate, but the objection was not removed by it. Finally her husband arrived on a visit, and to him she explained the embarrassment. He at once purchased a wedding ring, and that day she appeared at table with the symbol on her finger. The scruples of the boarders were satisfied, and there was no longer cause to complain of a lack of cordiality. One would have supposed that the marriage certificate would have been a better proof of the marriage having taken place than the mere presence of a ring. But people lay stress on symbols, not only in cases of that kind, but in religious matters. Many people think more of a rite or ceremony than they do of the change of heart it signifies.

Circumcision verily profiteth if thou keep the law, but if thou be a breaker of the law thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. (Rom. 2: 25.)

Identity of Race.

A Boston journal in reporting the discussion which has arisen over the finding of flint implements by Mr. Seton Karr in Somaliland, says that the discovery is considered by ethnologists one of the most important contributions of recent times to the evidence by means of which men of science hope, eventually, to be able to locate the cradle of the human race. The implements referred to are identical in form with those found in northwestern Europe and in India, and this fact is thought to be an indication that in the remote prehistoric times called the Palaeolithic age, the inhabitants of Asia, Africa and Europe belonged to a single race. So that after all, the scientists appear to be coming to the conclusion announced centuries ago by the Apostle:

God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on the face of the earth. (Acts 17: 26.)

A Search for a Sister.

Strange news has reached the family of a wealthy farmer in Ohio, according to a local journal. It is that a daughter who for twenty years has been mourned as dead is living on the other side of the Atlantic. It appears that in the early seventies the farmer's wife was sick and was advised to take an ocean voyage. She and her husband and their little son, then five years old, went to Europe and spent several months at a health resort in the south of France. There a daughter was born who, owing to the mother's delicate health, was intrusted to the care of an experienced nurse. Arrangements were made with the nurse to care for the infant while the family were traveling. She was to report to them regularly. The first report was that the babe was well, but the second announced that she was sick, and in a few days came the news that she was dead. The parents were greatly distressed and their home-coming was saddened by their loss. A few days ago they received a letter from the hotel-keeper in Southern France, at whose house they stayed, informing them that the French nurse in whose care they had left their babe had made a confession on her death-bed. She said that their child was alive and well. At the time it was left with her, she had also in her care, an infant belonging to a noble family. That infant died, and the nurse fearing to inform the parents of the fact, substituted the American child for it. The child had grown up and she stated where she might be found. The parents, being now unable to leave home, are sending their son over to search for his sister. Whether she will be willing, if he finds her, to leave her foster parents and go to her real parents may be doubted. The power of long association is sometimes stronger than ties of blood. Even the offer of becoming sons of God often proves insufficient to induce men to abandon the world with the pleasures and delights they have learned to love.

They all with one consent began to make excuse, etc. (Luke 14: 13-20.)

The king saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither not having a wedding garment? and he was speechless. (Matt. 22: 12.)

Boarding-House Scruples.

The Saratoga, N. Y., correspondent of a New York journal reports an episode in a boarding-house in that town which involved an unjust suspicion. A gentleman came there with his wife and child, the latter about two years old. He stayed only one day, and having seen his wife comfortably established in the boarding-house, returned to his home, leaving her and their child behind. The lady expected soon to make friends with the other ladies among the boarders, but was painfully surprised at the unanimity with which they one and all repulsed her advances. The unpleasantness increased rather than diminished, and the lady tried in vain to ascertain the cause. Finally the mystery was solved by the action of the boarding-house keeper, who politely, but decidedly,

Can I get unbiased, impartial information on subjects, such as the tariff, free-trade, trade unionism and others about which there is so much difference of opinion?
You want facts, not inferences and opinions. The information you can get in the WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is compact form. The information is unbiased and impartial, and sufficient to enable you to form an opinion for yourself.

Is it true that, up to the present time, the United States has always been a single standard government? Where can I find a brief outline of our national financial policy for the last fifty years?
You will find it concisely and accurately stated in THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA, at pages 6060 to 6065, Vol. 14, under the heading "Finances of the United States."

Can you direct me to the best authoritative biographical work, containing the history of living statesmen and men distinguished in science, letters and exploration?
One of the most valuable features of THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is the complete biographical branch of the work, which embraces all the renowned living personalities of the day.

Do any published work contain a reliable history of the nations that were contemporary with and prior to Israel? I do not want Josephus, as he is animated and not wholly accurate; but I wish some authority that speaks in the full light of the latest discoveries of ancient manuscripts and inscriptions.
The histories of Babylonia, Phœnicia, Assyria, Syria, Egypt, Parthia, Arabia, Mesopotamia and Chaldea, and all the older civilizations are fully set forth in THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA by able authors, being the most scholarly and comprehensive expositions of those subjects that have yet appeared.

Is it true that the countries and nations named in the Bible are the equivalent of a small volume of 25 pages being devoted to Egypt alone, and the others in proportion.
Have read several books on Polar exploration, and wish you could recommend me to others.
Indreds of volumes—many of them excellent—have been written on Arctic exploration. In THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA you will find a comprehensive digest of all that is valuable, serviceable and accurate on this subject. In scientific matters accuracy is indispensable, and every such article in THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is based on the latest scientific research.

What books would you recommend as likely to be most serviceable for a young man whose education has not been very thorough, although he has a fair knowledge of some subjects? He cannot afford to purchase a library, and yet wishes to be accurately informed on as wide a variety of subjects as possible, such as are liable to come in social and debating clubs, and young men's societies.
The sum total of wisdom and knowledge gathered in books, would make a very large library indeed. If our young friend wishes to equip himself intellectually on ALL subjects of human interest—history, science, theology, biology, mythology, travel, art, biography, classics, physiology, &c., from the beginning of things down to the practical questions of to-day, he should study THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA. It is a fountain of knowledge on all subjects, each of its fifteen large volumes containing more compact wisdom than was ever stored in the brain of the greatest sage on earth.

The Test.

THE two comrades had been side by side in their classes during four years, in one of the great co-educational schools of the West. It was quite in the natural order of things that, having many tastes in common and being disposed to like the same studies, they should have fallen in love with one another. Commencement was over, and the students were fast scattering to their homes. Presently a hush would fall on the little town, in which the college and its interests played so important a part, and as for the great college buildings they would stand big and bare and barn-like, with the air of a deserted village, until September's tocsin should again rally their bright host of young people.

The Letsons were aristocrats by birth and breeding. Dunbar's ancestral home stood back from the broad, main street of his town, almost hidden by great elms and maples, and in the wide, stately rooms three generations of his family had lived in honor and pride. His father had been Governor of his State; his mother was a gentlewoman of the old regime, courteous, graceful, and highly accomplished. The traditions of his house and race were fine, and the deferent urbanity of his manner came to him by descent. In college he had been everywhere a favorite, not more because the professors and students alike admired him, but because he possessed the magnetism which makes a man a leader, and both in the class-room and in athletics, had been popular and beloved. Dunbar Letson was handsome in his strong, young manhood, but his beauty of face and person was less a factor in his attractiveness than his perfect grace of gentle training.

"Dora," he said in their last quiet talk, "you have not yet said that you would be my wife. Give me my answer now, dearest. Let me go home with the best incentive a man can have, to work for success in life, the knowledge that the woman who fulfils his ideal will share whatever he attempts."

It was a long speech, grave and characteristic of Dunbar Letson. He did everything with a certain intensity and a momentum increasing after a leisurely beginning. He waited tranquilly, confident of Dora McBirney's reply. To his surprise she hesitated.

A girl and a man never arrive suddenly at such a conversation as this which culminates in a proposal. By slow degrees, by many unspoken thoughts, by sociable intercourse day in and day out, they are led to the stage, where courtship asks something more than nebulous hope, when a definite promise is desired and vows are exchanged. Dunbar did not fear a refusal, though his heart beat faster than usual, as he waited for Dora's anticipated yes.

"My friend," she said, after a pause, "you have never seen my home and my people. Till you do, I cannot allow you to commit yourself by any pledges. Come and ask me in my father's house, and I will then give you your answer."

With this, Dunbar had to be satisfied, and it seemed to him only the proper thing, and quite what a lady should exact. Train-time came, and they parted.

When he had his first confidential talk with his mother after his return from college, Dunbar told her of his wooing. He did not understand the mother's instinctive chill withdrawing, for sons cannot comprehend that mothers are jealous of the love which marks the departure of the days when they have been all in all to their boys. Mrs. Letson conquered feeling so far as to repress any spoken protest, but she asked two questions:

"Is this young lady a Christian, Dunbar?"

"Yes, mother; one of the sweetest, truest, most sincere and active Christian workers I know. We were brought together first in the Christian Endeavor Society."

"Is she of good family?"

Dunbar stiffened. "I suppose so," he said. "She is, at all events, a gentlewoman, like yourself or my sisters."

"McBirney is a good name," the mother added, as if replying to her own inquiry. "But I hope her people are refined and thoroughly of our own class."

Dunbar rose.

"Mother," he said firmly, "if Dora's people were Comanche Indians, and she would have me, I would marry her before any woman in the world. I am not marrying, or seeking to marry, a family. I am going to marry the woman I love, and I am not afraid that she will not adorn any station in which she can be placed."

Mrs. Letson said no more. As well try to stem Niagara with a chip, as to interpose an obstacle in the way of a young man thoroughly in love, and in earnest.

A few days later, in a cabin home under the shoulder of an overhanging hill in the Blue Ridge country, the family were sitting down to supper. The table was of the plainest. No silver or elegant china embellished it, the cloth was coarse, the two-tined forks were old and bent.

The father of the household, an old man with a patriarchal beard, sat at the head of the table and reverentially asked a blessing on the food. His daughter, a slim, beautiful, brown-cheeked girl, in a dark-blue cotton gown, poured the tea, and her brothers and sisters barefooted and plainly clad, ate with little attention to decorum. In fact, except when Dora was at home, nobody cared how they ate or paid attention to their deportment; the father insisting scrupulously on obedience and truth, two cardinal points in home-training, but caring nothing for what he considered show or airs. Dora's superfine ways, since she had been at college, to which the legacy of an aunt had enabled her to go, were distasteful to her plain old father, and as for her mother, who was illiterate, they were the occasion of resentful comment and censure.

"She's plum spoiled, Jonathan," would the old lady say to her husband. "I wish she never had Cynthia's money. She'll never amount to nothin'!"

"Probably she'll go away and teach," the father would say. "Dora's a good girl. But I don't like her affectations any more'n you do. Just box any of the others if you see them imitat' her, or send the boys for an interview with me. Plain, straightforward children are all I want, Jane."

Poor Dora! No wonder she had hesitated, and dreaded the acquaintance of her lover, with her family circle. We do not always recognize the fact that good people, children of the same heavenly Father, may be as far apart as the poles in their way of looking at daily life, their habits of speech, and their manners at the table.

But Dora McBirney was too sensible a young woman to make herself miserable over things which were after all, merely superficial. She adored her father, though she felt that he disapproved of what she was quite unaware of, a certain town-bred polish she had imperceptibly acquired, and as for her mother, she felt toward her the protectiveness of a stronger to a weaker nature.

Dunbar's first introduction to the McBirneys was one evening as they were ready to sit down to their supper. Dora watched him, quick to observe whether he was critical or patronizing. But the young man was neither. Your true gentleman is at home in all society, and possesses the magical secret of setting everybody at ease. He won over the old people, and pleased the younger ones. The family appeared at its best before him. When at family prayer he joined his clear tenor to the other voices in the hymn, the father looked pleased. His bed under the eaves was clean and fragrant, his tenderly loving manner to Dora was more reverential than ever during his visit, and when he left, he had obtained her father's consent, as well as Dora's, to his marriage. Dunbar Letson had stood the test his longed-for bride had proposed.

As for her, his heart will safely trust in her, and she will do him good and not evil all the days of her life.

In Old Moorish Homes.

Granada's Faded Glories, and the Days when the Mohammedans Ruled Spain—Its Present Inhabitants.

FOUR centuries have passed away since the Mohammedan power was driven out of Spain, by the fall of the Moorish kingdom of Granada, in the famous war conducted with such spirit by Ferdinand and Isabella. In that long and memorable crusade of Christian against Moslem, there were some episodes of terrible barbarity. The fanatical Moorish armies perpetrated excesses which aroused all Christendom, and the Christian princes banded together, resolved at whatever cost to expel the Moors. This was at last accomplished. Malaga and Granada, the strongholds of the Moorish empire, were captured, and Boabdil, the last of the alien monarchs of the Crescent to rule in Western Europe, was deprived of his power and possessions, and became a vassal of Spain.

The story of the Moorish period of occupation is now only recalled by the magnificent architectural remains of that period that still exist in many localities in Granada. Nowhere in Europe are there any structures excelling in dignity of conception and extreme delicacy of treatment those found in the Alhambra group. Combining many of the features of Saracenic and Arabian architecture, the Moorish workmen wrought in a style which, though replete with ornament, was yet conspicuously graceful and striking, lacking the heaviness of the Gothic and the Roman, and retaining in a multiplied form something of the beauty of the Greek. In the remains of their mosques, tombs, and palaces, and even in many homes of the wealthier class, this rich elaboration is still visible. Slender, graceful pillars, topped by ornate capitals, support the buildings, rising to delicately-formed arches, heavy with tracery that seems to the observer as fine as the filigree work of a silversmith.

The photograph reproduced on this page (the entrance to a country-house in Granada), gives an idea of the general style of such buildings. The house itself is surrounded by a cool, well shaded court yard, rich in foliage and still further cooled by the spray of fountains. The windows and doorways of their dwellings were made small to shut out the heat.

Much of the life of the Moorish household was and still is, passed out-of-doors, but in the privacy of the court—which served the same purpose as the Mexican patio. As Granada is rich in alabaster and other precious stones, the pillars and carvings of many of these old Moorish houses were composed of such material. To-day, however, Moorish architecture is a thing of the past, and the descendants of that scattered race are seemingly wholly incapable of the energy and artistic talents of their warlike ancestors.

In the older quarter of Granada, there are still many buildings that retain much of the ancient Moorish style, but the modern part is commonplace.

Karnattah, as the Moors called their capital city (meaning "the hill of the strangers"), has many beautiful squares, and one finely-shaded walk called the Alameda, where the beauty and fashion of the old town delight to promenade in the cool of the day. The climate is pleasant and healthy. Among the poor, however, the same condition of deplorable ignorance and neglect exists that is found in many other Spanish cities. The life of the wealthy is one of ease and indolent pleasure, with little regard for the welfare of those who live in the squalid quarters and whose horizon of hope and ambition is bounded by the dingy walls of some old, decaying courtyard. With a proper degree of enterprise and Christian consideration for the poorer class, the city might once again become, what it probably was in the old days, one of the finest, most prosperous and most important in the Spanish dominions.

Petting and Pampering.

It is a pernicious habit to pet and pamper our children, going to the extreme of indulgence, just as many run to the opposite.

Christian parents can afford to spend their summers amid scenes which will familiarize their children with coarse manners, profane language or vicious habits. Better that your boy never have an outing than that he take it outside good associations and clean living. Take your outings; take them regularly, freely, largely; but take them as you take all good gifts of God, with a good conscience, and let them be treasured in a memory that knows no stain of sorrowful remembrance. Let your vacations be recreation, and wherever you go, go as God's child to find fellowship with all of God's creatures. Then the vacation season may be looked forward to with fond anticipation, and back upon with pleasant recollection.

Shepherd Women of the Tyrol.

Among the mountaineers of the Tyrol the women still bear a conspicuous share of the burden of daily labor, just as their mothers and grandmothers did before them. The shepherdesses—for in nearly every instance the flocks are tended by girls or women—live in absolute solitude; only the loudest blast of their horn or a piercing yodel can be heard by the near-companion a large sheep-dog, and these women live for months at a time, like hermits of the mountains.

Living for the Children.

COME, let us live with our children Earnestly, holily live, Knowing ourselves the sweet lesson, That to the children we give. Fresh from the kingdom of heaven Into this earth-life they come, Not to abide; we must lead them Back to their heavenly home.

Come, let us live for our children, Leading them tenderly on Into the fields that God's love-light, Ever shines brightly upon. Thine when our feet grow too weary For the safe guidance of youth, We shall be like the children To Him who is goodness and truth

A Princess' Domestic Life.

PRINCESS MAUD, the youngest and cleverest of the daughters of the Princess of Wales, who was united in marriage a few days ago to Prince Charles of Denmark, is a young lady of more than ordinary accomplishments, both London and Copenhagen, she is well known and greatly liked in society generally. But it is in the privacy of home life that her character has been best disclosed. She was her father's nurse during a long illness, and performed the duties of her position in a way that surprised and delighted the doctors. Like her sisters, she is thoroughly domestic in her tastes, although she loves to skate, ride and swim, and is a capital amateur photographer. She takes more pleasure in making good butter at her father's dairy at Sandringham, or good bread in the kitchen than in anything about amid frivolous society. In London, when she rode about in the city, it was generally for the purpose of attending some public meeting in the interest of philanthropy. She is a fine musician, playing both piano and violin. Her husband, Prince Carl, is a tall, big six-footer and a lieutenant in the Danish Navy.

Copenhagen, where the young pair will probably make their home during a part of the year at least, is one of the most delightful of European cities, and lies on the margin of a beautiful bay. The seashore is bordered with fine gardens, and everything has an air of prosperity and contentment. One meets smiling faces everywhere, with pleasant features and cheerful, healthy complexions. The people of the Court, including even the king himself, are constantly to be met, walking, riding or driving without an escort, and in the most unostentatious manner imaginable. Copenhagen is essentially a Lutheran city, and has some fine churches, built like Greek temples. There are many picturesque places in the neighborhood. There is the fine Castle of Bernstorff, where the royal circle gathers, and where the Queen Louise holds gently sway. In the winter, the sovereigns usually occupy Amalienborg Castle, which is also in the city. At Klampenborg, another pretty suburban spot, townspeople go for a holiday to dine, sup and listen to the music of a military band. Besides these, there are a hundred other attractions, easily accessible, that combine to make the Danish capital an exceedingly agreeable place.

Ornament in Dress.

There is a medium in the matter of dress which it would be well to observe as far as possible. There are some good people who are extremely rigid and who believe that ornament is a sin. They put forth "no ornament" as a law, and proclaim that the Christian life forbids all ornament in attire. Yet the earth is profusely adorned by the Creator's hand. Love of the beautiful is natural and universal, and, says the philosophical writer, he who "teaches that Christ condemns ornament, puts the Christ of the New Testament in direct antagonism to the God who created us." who said, "Consider the lilies," does not lay upon men such heavy burdens. Some of his followers would have them carry, and he who has filled the world with beauty and made it minister to human joy and human culture, has laid upon us such a burthen. Everything else appears in attractive garb, and so children and women and men too have the full right to make themselves personally attractive to those around them.

THE COURTYARD OF A MOORISH COUNTRY-HOUSE, GRANADA.

site extreme of severity. In the home, in Sunday School and church, our whole study may be to please the child, and make the way easy. But when the household pet passes into the business world, the way is not made easy. Grim difficulties confront it on every hand, and nothing but pluck, patience, and perseverance will overcome them. But the child who has always been entertained and helped along an easy way is not likely to possess these important qualities. The result is impatience, restlessness, and fret and fever and violence. There is no surer method of making poor men than to begin by making spoilt children.

Vacation Pleasures.

At no time is parental supervision of the recreations of our children more necessary than during the season of summer outing. Says a thoughtful writer: No family of est neighbor, who is miles away; it is thus that they know of one another's existence. The girls live, during the summer, in a low hut, without windows or chimneys, having an entrance (minus a door) opening toward the south. As a rule, a place beside a sheltering, hospitable rock is chosen as the building site, so that it may serve for one side of the cabin and at the same time be a protection from avalanches that come rushing down the mountains with such deadly power, sweeping all in their path to destruction. Under this rude shelter the young and sickly animals are gathered nightly to protect them from the cold and wet; here the milk is kept and the cheeses made. The girls' bed is an elevated shelf (so high from the ground that she requires a ladder to reach it), on which some leaves and grass are strewn. She is here safe from being trampled on by the cattle. The shepherdess has for a

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor topic for the Week Beginning August 16.
 Psalm 19: 1-6; 24: 1-10.

MANY persons have the idea that the tendency of modern science is to exclude God from the world. They think that if the scientists could have their way, they would substitute natural for God, and teach mankind that the manifestations of power and energy in nature are the only supreme and eternal forces in the universe. Yet there is probably far less infidelity now than in past generations. Men are not yet prepared to do without a God or to worship blind fate. But science has really no atheistic object in view. It has patiently and persistently tried to understand the laws of the universe, and has found order, and regularity, and power, and the connection of cause and effect where former generations did not suppose them to exist. But what then? It has simply discovered the laws and laws in nature, and the devout believer welcomes this discovery as proving that God is wiser than his forefathers supposed. The wonderful adaptation of means to ends, the wondrous provision to meet natural needs which the scientist has discovered everywhere in nature, argues a being of infinite wisdom. As a great writer has said, "Science has built an altar at which Religion worships." It is as if a man were to take an intelligent child to see one of the modern printing presses and explain to him how the paper is carried over the rollers and is pressed on the stereotypes, and how the ink is distributed, and the paper being printed is cut and folded; and show him the complicated machine in operation, each part automatically and efficiently doing precisely the duty it was designed to do. The child looks on in wonder, but does not for a moment suppose, nor does the man expect him to suppose, that the machine had a maker. Rather, the inspector tends to produce admiration for the wisdom of the inventor, and for the skill with which the parts of his invention have been made, and so exactly adjusted and dove-tailed to work harmoniously and smoothly. So science has searched the universe, patiently investigating phenomena, and has found behind all, laws working regularly and evenly with an endless variety, yet with wondrous harmony. We no longer believe, as the ancients did, that thunder is God's voice. The scientist has explained how the reverberations are produced; but have we lost anything by losing the ancient belief? The intelligent and is more disposed to reverence by the revelation of power than it was by the terror of its roar. The scientist is working from the near to the far, and as he goes forward, he discovers it everywhere and suspects that there is law where at present all seems chance. But he is merely learning the methods by which the Creator works. All his discoveries suggest the Origin of the universe in infinite wisdom. He cannot discover the Origin. Far as he may go, it is still beyond him. He sees the footprints and marks the evidences of the designing Mind, but he cannot penetrate into its presence. But that is precisely what the believer expected. Faith takes up the object at whatsoever point the scientist leaves it, and realizes that these wonders that are shown to him are what he would have expected of the God whom he worships. The God of nature is the God of the Bible. As adorable in nature as in grace.

My Debt.

O FRIENDS, whom I have never seen!
 Who yet have helped me on my way,
 Who've made earth look more fair and green,
 And added sunshine to my day.
 O Hero! through whose noble deed
 My own weak soul has stronger grown;
 O Poet! in whose lines I read
 A message sweet, and all my own.
 Clear thinker! who to me revealed
 Some truth or beauty rare and fine,
 To which my eyes had still been sealed,
 Hadst thou not made thy treasure mine.
 O Painter! who for me did place
 Upon the glowing canvas there,
 That sweet, that rarely beautiful face,
 That woos me for a while from care.

O Saint! whose pure and holy life
 Makes me long to be holy, too;
 To wage with wrong unceasing strife—
 How can I pay my debt to you?
 O Friends, whom I have never seen!
 Who yet are helping me each day:
 The good you've done to me, I ween,
 I never can to you repay.
 But I can pass the cup along—
 The cup of blessing fresh and sweet—
 Into some mouth can put a song.
 Can smooth some path for weary feet.
 And this shall be the payment meet
 I'll render for your gifts to me:
 I'll try to make the lives more sweet
 Of some whom you will never see.

Times of Culmination.

Twenty-three Reasons for Believing the Times of the Gentiles are Near Their End.

BY HENRY VARLEY.*

THE study of Matthew 24 and Luke 21, in relation to the conditions which our Lord said would be identified with the actual time of his coming to the earth "in power and great glory," yields, in the light of events which are now transpiring, some remarkable indications that the time of the end of this age is come.

Between the Scylla of human speculation in regard to Christ's coming and the Charybdis of an intelligent and cultured rationalism which either sets aside or ignores the plainest statements given by our Lord in regard to his appearing and glory, it is necessary that we steer a clear and definite course.

The fact stated by our Lord that "that day will come as a snare upon all them that dwell upon the face of the whole earth," is conclusive as to the unbelief and guilty silence which he declared would prevail at the time. The dividing-line between modern philosophic rationalism and the great supernatural facts revealed in "the sure word of prophecy" is found here. To set forth certain of these facts is the object of this paper.

1. The national and world-wide unrest which everywhere exists, and the readiness for war found specially among the great and highly-civilized nations of Europe.

2. The evident approach of the dissolution of the Turkish Empire, and the breaking up of the governmental rule of the Mohammedan power so far as Jerusalem and Palestine are concerned.

3. The striking indications of Israel's national renewal and resuscitation—that which the Holy Spirit in a national sense speaks of as "life from the dead" (Rom. 11: 15).

4. The fact of the receiving of Christ Jesus the Lord as the Messiah by large numbers of the Jews during the past twenty years.

5. The recent return in unbelief of more than 50,000 of God's people Israel to Jerusalem and Palestine, in great poverty and sorrow, and as the result of bitter persecution and oppression.

6. The actual "arising" of the city of Jerusalem at the close of the long and weary centuries during which the Lord Jesus declared she should be "trodden down" of the Gentiles.

7. The desolation of Jerusalem and the land was to continue until (but not beyond) the end of the great epoch called by our Lord, "the Times of the Gentiles" (Luke 21: 24).

8. "The Times of the Gentiles" comprehend 2,520 years, during which governmental supremacy, at the instance of Jehovah, was to pass out of the hands of Israel and Judah into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar the Great.

9. These "Times" began when Jehoiakim, the last king of the house of David that ever occupied his throne, was taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylon.

10. The date, according to the most recent chronology, was near to, if not in, the year 620 B. C. Add 1896 A. D. to 620 B. C., and the total of 2,516 prove that we are very near the end of these Times.

11. The "Times of the Gentiles," interpreted in the light of Jewish and Gentile history, represent the predicted "seven times" of Moses, Daniel, and John.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

W. H. K., Tarpon Springs, Fla. How old was David when he was crowned king?

The Scriptural record does not tell his age, but gives an indication of it in II. Sam. 16: 17, 18. Josephus states that David was "a youth—no more than a child in age, but comely and beautiful." The presumption is that he was a sturdy, fair-haired, growing lad of fifteen to twenty.

Mrs. M. R., Star Prairie, Wis. 1. When Jesus cried out on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" must we believe it is a literal statement that Jesus in his great agony did feel that God had forsaken him? If so, what lesson can we derive from it? 2. Is it right to ask God to forgive our sins?

1. It means that Christ in taking the sinner's place drank to the dregs the cup of divine justice and felt himself an outcast from his Father's presence. His last cry, however, in commending his soul to God showed that he recovered his confidence before he died. 2. Yes, and every other grace. He knows how weak we are.

W. K., Carlin, Nev. In what language was it that our Lord spoke the words, "Eloi, Eloi, lama, sabachthani?"

The Aramaean language. It is the northern and least developed branch of the Syro-Arabian tongues, and is a general term for the whole, of which the Chaldaic and Syriac dialects form parts. While the Jews maintained their national independence, Hebrew was the national language, but all this was changed after Assyria and Chaldea subdued the land. The Babylonish Aramaean dialect superseded the ancient Hebrew.

Silas D., Akron, O. After those as many animals now as when Adam named them in Eden, or more?

It is impossible to satisfactorily answer such a question. At the present time, according to zoological authorities, over 300,000 species of animals have been described by naturalists up to date.

Reader, Virginia. Could any circumstances justify a Christian man in asking a lady to grant him a divorce? If he has been abandoned by his wife, and she has refused to be forgiven, and have confidence restored, how should he proceed to bring about a reconciliation in a right manner?

To attempt to continue acquaintance in the way suggested after such a demonstration, would be an impertinence and would probably meet with a prompt and forcible rebuke. Assuming that the parties are innocent of wrong, the better way to reach an understanding and restore confidence would be to personally explain matters to the husband, who has a right to expect to be considered, before any reconciliation is possible.

S. J., Detroit, Mich. In your issue of the question asked by M. H. A., Brooklyn, N. Y. "What authority have we to use in divine worship any hymns or songs that were not written by the apostles and early fathers of the Christian Church; and you say that the hymns of the church are of human origin and spiritual songs." Do you think the Apostle Paul wrote the hymns, or do you think they are all in the Psalms, or do you honestly believe that the hymns of the church are of human origin in the church in Paul's day? Who wrote them and what has become of them?

In a book issued this year by Scribners, entitled The Evolution of Church Music (by Rev. F. L. Humphreys, with preface by Bishop Potter of New York), the whole subject is fully and conclusively discussed. The primitive Christian hymns (of the very earliest of which no authentic record now remains), were sung in the East by the Jews, and in the West by the Greeks. They were not of the same type. At first they were sung in antiphon, or in a kind of chorus, and the same notes as the boys and women, but an octave lower. A report received by the Emperor Trajan, in A. D. 110, from Pliny, the Younger, stated that the Christians had the custom to assemble before daylight and sing hymns to Christ. In the fourth century, under the influence of the church fathers, much the first "arrangement" of sacred music, and compiled the hymns for the regular services of the church. A number of his compositions (doubtless modernized), have come down to us.

Lambert Bewke, Paterson, N. J. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 18, I find an article on "Armenia's Desperate Plight." Their sufferings ought to stir every Christian to prayer, diligence and a sense of obligation to help. What a vast difference between us and these our persecuted and down-trodden brethren! It occurred to me if twenty-five thousand self-sacrificing Christians would each give ten dollars, how many families could be brought to this haven or some other land of freedom, where no fanatical oppression exists. Perhaps you know of a more practical way. I will gladly change my suggestion for a better, but for one, though a hard tasker from morning till evening, I will gladly give the proposed ten dollars for a cause so well deserving our endeavor.

Hundreds of thousands of Christian men and women share the feeling of indignation expressed against Turkey in our correspondent's letter. The emigration scheme, however, is impracticable; we have made the fullest inquiry before reaching this decision. The Sultan, like Pharaoh of old, refuses to "let the people go," and the European Powers are too jealous of each other to interfere. America has done a noble work in succoring the destitute Armenians and it is still going on. Remittances are still being made from our Relief Fund, although contributions have practically ceased. Despite prohibitions and official vigilance, parties of Armenians are leaving Turkey and making their way to this country. As they usually arrive here penniless, and are consequently liable to be returned as paupers, expanded at sixteen different stations in Armenia proper. The relief afforded has been temporary thus far, owing to the great extent of the suffering. 2. No; the European nations have not interfered and probably will not. 3. It has worked and still works in conjunction with the missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M. independent of other organizations. This seemed to us to be the most direct and surest way of reaching the centres of suffering and of affording prompt relief.

T. C. Lipscombe, Ninety-six, S. C. What became of the Ark of the Covenant?

No one knows. It appears to have disappeared before the conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. If he had taken it we think it would have been mentioned in the list of treasures in II. Chronicles, 36, which he carried off. It was so sacred and so valuable that the historian would surely have mentioned it. It was probably hidden when the city was in danger of being taken, and all the people who knew its hiding-place may have been killed when the city was captured. The orthodox Jews have a theory that when the Messiah, for whom they are looking, appears, one of the evidences he will give of his identity will be to disclose the hiding-place of the Ark.

W. B. A., Providence, R. I. If a man has an invalid wife and four children, and has an income of thirteen dollars a week, is it his duty to give a tenth of it to the Lord?

The Christian is not under law but under grace. The law of the tenth does not apply to him. The only way in which it can be legitimately connected with his duty is on the ground that, being free from law and having greater privileges than the Jews who were under the law of the tenth, he will not give a smaller proportion of his income than they were required to give. In the case you mention we do not think it is the man's duty to give a tenth. It would be a much greater burden to him and a far more severe tax than would a much larger amount be to a man of larger income. A man who had an income of eration. It should not be done willingly lightly, but with extreme reluctance and an stern sense of duty. The man should remember that he was rash and should have known his own mind better, before becoming engaged. To retreat afterwards must inevitably cause suffering and possibly humiliation, and should strive to render both as light as possible. But an uncongenial marriage involves so much misery for both parties, that no person should be compelled by a hasty or rash promise to enter upon it. It is better for both to break the engagement than to proceed in it. It is clear that there will be bickering and disagreement after marriage.

J. B. C., Decatur, Ga. When persons have secured divorces, because of the unfaithfulness of their partners, are they justified in marrying again?

The injured partners seem to us to have a right to contract a new marriage in conscience as in law, unless there has been provocation or connivance on their part. If a husband and wife find the bond irksome and agree to one of the two shall furnish the necessary cause for the dissolution of the marriage; if there is a tacit agreement of that kind; or if there is a deliberate plot to bring one of the partners under strong temptation, then seems to us that both are equally guilty and deserve no consideration. But when either partner has suffered innocently and without contributory fault, it would be unreasonable and unjust to require of that one perpetual celibacy as a punishment for the fault of the other.

John Jones, Carleton Co., Neb. Was the late C. Spurgeon, of London, an ordained minister? If not, was he competent to baptize and administer the sacrament?

Mr. Spurgeon was never ordained. As God honored his ministry by the conversion of immense number of souls both by his spoken sermons, and by their circulation in print form, we may conclude that he had the divine authority to preach, he might surely baptize and administer the sacrament. He was recognized and honored by his brother ministers in England, and we never heard of his right to officiate either ordination or being challenged.

T. Belsher, Fargo, Wis. Was the Sabbath changed from the seventh to the first day of the week?

It does not appear that the observance of the seventh day the Sabbath ever extended to any marked degree beyond the Jewish nation. While the Gospel was preached among the Gentiles by the Apostle Paul, it would appear that the conversion met together on the Sunday, regularly every week, to commemorate the resurrection of the Lord. Acts 20: 7 shows that the practice observing the Lord's Day as a day of religious meeting had already commenced. Some Jewish formalists, as we find from the Acts and the Epistles, wanted to bring the Gentiles under bondage as to circumcision, probably about the Sabbath, too. But Paul resisted. The struggle about the rite of circumcision is fully described in the Bible, and we have a hint of the other question in Col. 2: 16 where Paul tells his converts to let no man judge them as to the Sabbath days. An effort is being made in the same direction now at the Apostle's advice is still pertinent.

A. F. B., Machpelah, N. C. There are several pieces dealing with that subject, probably the best being that by G. W. Moon, an English writer, entitled "Who Shall Kill the Stone-Away?"—Editor, N. J. Write to Tiffany & Co., N. Y. for information.—Mrs. Lydia S., Greenfield, Pa. N.—Constant Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y. Difficult summaries have different standards. Better write to the one you have in view.—M. I., Syracuse, N. Y. None that we know of.—The Protestant Orphan Girls' Home, of Baton Rouge, La., is in need of good religious literature.—Three S., Kansas, Va. Both are a mild sort of gambling to which reputable business houses would not consent.—H. S. McH., Jav. Vt. By international money order, if the amount be not large. Otherwise there are some American banks.—G. G. C., Baltimore, Md. The matter fully treated in McClintock & Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia.—John M. I., Machpelah, N. C. It is published by Randolph, N. Y. J. C. M. Germantown, Pa. 1. Machpelah. The edition of S. S. Leland, Idaho. 1. The husband appears to have fallen into a trap set for him legally, and the wife's subsequent conduct reflects honorably on her moral obligation. 2. The wife could obtain God's forgiveness only by sincere penitence and humble faith in Christ. 3. The book is published by Historical Publishing Company, Philadelphia.—J. S. Moorland, Mich. 1. That such ceremonies as Oriental heathens were not in our own land have come into vogue. People who were not spiritually awakened might take part in them, but not one who had just become his disciple. 2. It is a most prayer, simple and brief, and we do not think it is anywhere in the Bible, as it was not known so far as we are aware in Bible times. 3. The harm is liable to come later if it leads to a marriage engagement, and it may do. If either person is already married, the danger to be apprehended from a correspondence of the kind you mention is very much the greater. In any case the practice is of doubtful utility.

under the Emigration Laws, the proprietor of this journal, with a view to saving them from such a calamity, has undertaken to furnish such guarantees for their temporary maintenance here as the law requires. Our readers and their friends can help materially in this work, if they wish, by finding employment for these people on their arrival. We shall be glad to have the co-operation of as many of our friends as possible, the writer of the foregoing letter included. Thus we shall be helping the persecuted Armenians at both ends of the line.

A. C. I., Schaghticoke, N. Y. I recently happened to be present at a Sunday school class, where the teacher during a lesson, said there were many things happened here which we could not understand, but he thought the mysteries of earth would be partly revealed in heaven. My idea is that they will be fully revealed in heaven—that there are many mysteries which I should like full light on. What is your idea?

Doubtless, the heaven-life will be the key to the earth-life, and when our spiritual natures are unfolded and our spiritual eyes opened, we shall then more clearly comprehend those things that have seemed inexplicable. (See I. Cor. 13: 9-12). The teacher was probably right, as many things which we now deem important may then appear to be insignificant. Nothing is of real importance, except as it affects the development of spiritual character.

O. N., Boston, Mass. Our old friend, who parted with the cry from Armenia. Some of us have already contributed, but we wish to do more. We are interested in the Armenian Relief Fund. How many different societies are at work and what are their objects? Do you think it is possible to have a single society for the purpose?

The Armenian Relief work is now conducted by the American Relief Fund. The American Relief Fund is the United Western Relief Fund (English), the Armenian Relief Association, of which Rev. Mr. Greene is secretary, and the American Relief of Commissioners of Foreign Missions. For a full list of societies in the field, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been thirteen dollars a week with no one depending upon him would have to make less of a sacrifice in giving five dollars than this man would in giving one dollar. The surplus over and above expenditures for absolute necessities is the true measure of a man's income. The Christian will take a pleasure in denying himself some little luxury that he may give to the Lord's cause, but he should not incur debt, nor take the money that his children need for bread to give to religion.

A. L. R. 1. Does the prohibition of women speaking I. Cor. 14: 34, 35 still remain in force? 2. Is a man called upon to forsake his family as described in Matt. 19: 30? 3. Who are the first and the last referred to in Matt. 20: 16 and parallel passages? 4. Why are contradictory directions given in Prov. 26: 4, 5 as to the treatment of fools?

1. We think the reasons which impelled Paul to give the prohibition having no longer any existence, that the prohibition is not in force. It is easy to see why in his day grave evils would have resulted from women taking a prominent part in meetings of the church, but such evils would not follow in the present day and we think Paul would not approve of the women being silenced. 2. No, but he ought to love Christ so well that if the alternative of forsaking him or of forsaking his family were ever forced on him he would give up all for Christ. 3. The first are men who esteem themselves superior to others, and also some whom the church regards as superior. In God's sight their pride is offensive, and some humble Christian will be preferred to them. 4. The directions are only apparently contradictory. The two verses simply describe the results of the two methods of treating them. You can choose for yourself which is the better way. Each has its danger.

"Perplexed," Richmond, Va. Is a young man justified in becoming a married man if he has no money to support his family, and if the wife has no family which are liable to render married life uncomfortable?

We think he is justified, as we think the law would be justified if she made a similar discovery. But in either case, there should be the utmost delicacy and kindness and consid-

RUNNING THE GAUNTLET.

OR

By Wm E. S. Baker.

Brookdale's Sunday School.

BROOKDALE is not the name our village bears on the maps. If any of its people think I am taking an unwarrantable liberty in giving the village a new name for my story, I must remind them that I am fully following an example that has been set by very revered people. William Penn and his friends took upon themselves to replate the name by which the Indians call the district; and as the name they gave it does not suit me and I do not know the original name, which is surely the only one the village has an indefeasible right to claim, it cannot be injured by my giving it the name of Brookdale for reasons as satisfactory to me, as the name on the map was to the people who preferred it to the Indian name.

The village is not more, and may be less than a thousand miles from Philadelphia. Some people are interested in it on one account, others for other reasons, but my interest centres in a Sunday School there because among its teachers and scholars there are some whose lives are worth describing, and because I want my readers to know them and like them and get some good out of the record of their adventures.

First of all, I want to explain how it came about that this Sunday School had a picnic different from any that had previously taken place in its history. Before this time it had always been held on the afternoon of the fourth of July. Deacon Slowfoot, the time-honored superintendent, used to say, that "youngsters hadn't better go far away from home," and, as it was Independence Day, the Deacon gave notice that he wouldn't listen to no such nonsense."

Here, every fourth of July afternoon, when it didn't rain, the Deacon and some of his seventy children, most of them little girls, climbed the hill which led to the grove, back of the old Brookdale Church, where they were called together and instructed by the good old parson, Dr. Plummer. Then somebody read the Declaration of Independence, and others sang a few old style hymns, when they solemnly marched home again. This had been the programme for years, until the larger children, as well as their parents, gave the Deacon the cold shoulder, because, instead of a joyous, pleasant, health-reviving afternoon, they had a dull and unprofitable time of it generally.

Nearly two years before the time of the last picnic, the Brookdale population was increased by two persons, who henceforth exercised great influence in the social and religious affairs of the whole neighborhood. One of them was William Plummer, a printer, who, with his wife and five children, came from the interior of Pennsylvania; and the other was Mrs. Seymour, and her only son, Milton.

Early in June, to the surprise of Deacon Slowfoot, a meeting was called to make arrangements for the annual picnic, and, when he went to attend it, he found the basement of the church nearly full of people. The deacon forgot the dignity of his office, and was angry because he had been consulted. He presided at the meeting, however, gave out a hymn: "Thou art long to know;" read the Epistle of Jude, and then made a long prayer.

"I propose," said Deacon Slowfoot, "that the school will proceed as usual to the wood back of the meetin' house, on the fourth of July afternoon?"

"Oh much," said Farmer Paramore; "the sort of thing is played out. Let us have a picnic as is a picnic, and none of your ilk and water, white frock and blue ribbon affairs."

"Just, beloved brethren in the Lord," said our old Father Jones, the pastor, his long, white hair being truly a crown of glory, as it waved in the evening breeze; "that the banner over us may be love, and that we may be among those who realize that it is good and pleasant for brethren to dwell together in unity. I hope, therefore, that all will be peace and harmony, and that we may be of one mind in this matter."

Mr. Plummer here arose. A short, round-headed man, stout and staunch, just the sort of fellow the life-insurance people like to get hold of. His face was free from whiskers or beard, and shone as if polished. He was a true son of light, full of love to God and love to man, and especially love for children. Everybody liked Mr. Plummer, whether they were sick or in health; he was so kind, so charitable, so full of faith and good works, that old Parson Jones said of him: "Brother Plummer is like the summer, we all welcome its coming and regret when it has departed." So that, when Mr. Plummer arose, and in a fifteen minutes speech pointed out the objections to the old style picnic, and sketched what it should be, everybody listened attentively, and Farmer Paramore even said aloud: "Go it, Plummer!" Mr. Plummer concluded by making a motion that a committee of three be appointed to consider the propriety of having an excursion. This was carried, and the committee of teachers, consisting of Mr. Plummer, Mrs. Seymour, and the superintendent, Deacon Slowfoot, retired for consultation.

They soon returned with a majority report and a resolution recommending that the church, school and congregation of old and young people go to Fisher's Grove, a few miles south of Brookdale, on the morning of July 23d; that the neighboring farmers be applied to for wagons and carriages, as well as provisions; that the village brass band be invited, also the young men from the Academy; and that a Committee of Amusements be appointed.

Deacon Slowfoot put in a minority report, recommending that the school, as usual, go on the fourth of July afternoon; but the vote was almost unanimous for the Fisher's Grove excursion; so the old deacon, quite chagrined, "stepped down and out," and did not remain longer in the room; although a month afterwards he returned to his first love, and went with the largest picnic that ever left Brookdale.

On the morning of the picnic the Brookdale streets were alive with people at an early hour. Some say the excitement ran so high that many could not sleep all night, as an excursion in carriages and wagons, headed by a brass band, was an unheard of proceeding. Besides, the fact that the Academy youth were expected to participate, brought out an unusual number of lasses from the surrounding country. New dresses, hats, fans, ribbons, feathers and furbelows were rapidly sold, and the storekeepers clapped their hands and favored excursions!

To make matters still more agreeable, Mr. Plummer, big-hearted man that he was, went to Mr. Walter and insisted upon his closing his cotton mills on that day, thus giving the inmates a chance to attend the picnic.

Before six o'clock the village band, with feathers flying, were playing a lively march on the main street of Brookdale, while carriages and wagons arrived every moment, full of gaily dressed people of all ages; and by six the procession moved off. First there was the band, then came two or three hay wagons with canvas covers, filled with frolicsome and happy children.

The Historic Port of Acre.

On the Syrian coast, not far from the base of Mount Carmel, lies the famous seaport of Acre or Acca (the Biblical Achcho), which was known in the Middle Ages as Ptolemais. It is commandingly situated, and but for the neglect of its fine harbor, which is now almost choked with sand, would be one of the most important cities in the East. Acre, like many other old-world cities, has undergone the vicissitudes of war, and has often changed masters. In the eleventh century it was taken by the Genoese, and in 1187 by Sultan Saladin. Later it became the chief landing-place of the Crusader hosts and the seat of a bishop. Its next masters were the Egyptians, and in 1799 it was subjected by the French to a memorable siege. In 1832 it was stormed by the son of the Viceroy of Egypt, and eight years later was bombarded and taken by a combined English, Austrian, and Turkish fleet. Our photograph on the opposite page, taken from the sea, presents a most attractive view of this famous city, once great and influential, but now little heard of in the affairs of the world.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

"My wife has suffered a good deal with female troubles and obtained but very little relief, until she began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla. She is now on her third bottle, and we have had no doctor in the house since she began the use of Hood's Sarsaparilla. It has produced a decided change for the better." GEO. E. Running the Gauntlet.

"No, dear, thank you," said Mrs. Seymour; "I have some friends here that I cannot leave."

"Who was that lady, Carrie, dear?" asked Mr. Walter, when the carriage was out of ear-shot. "You should have consulted me before asking her to a seat in our carriage."

"Why, that is Mrs. Seymour, my teacher; Oh, papa, but she is such a sweet woman. I forgot to ask you."

"Oh, yes, I remember now." Then after a pause, Mr. Walter said: "Carrie, you never knew your dear mamma, but that lady looks something like her in the face."

"And I do wish she was my mamma." Just as the procession of pleasure seekers reached the summit of the hill that overlooks the village as they looked westward, the sun shone brilliantly upon hundreds of farm houses in the valleys, and illuminated their windows with a glowing light, as if the whole visible world were in a burning flame of fire!

Before eight o'clock, Fisher's Grove was reached. It is on the slope and top of a steep hill, on either side of which is a creek. To the east, a mill-dam and pond are seen, with lovely views of the broad, green meadow, through the middle of which runs the sprightly river, and along its low banks, browse, every summer day, a score or more of handsome cows. The trees are large, affording ample shade, and on one edge of the woods a private road has been cut under the trees, where the horses find a good resting place; and beyond this is the baseball field. The pioneers of this excursion preceded the others, and by the time the picnic arrived, two large tubs had been placed beneath the trees and filled with spring water, in each of which floated a bushel of sparkling ice, and a dozen tin cups and ladles were attached to each tub. The tables and stands had been erected, the seats prepared, and everything was in readiness for a day of pleasure.

Once there, the children seemed to have passed the Jordan into the promised land, and the shouts which went up from the boys, and the gay songs and laughter of the girls, who were brim full of enjoyment, as they climbed the hill again towards the main stand, would have made every lover of children full of joy, as he witnessed so much merriment and happiness.

When they had reached the hill-top, Mr. Plummer rang a bell, and told them that, after singing a hymn, and a short prayer, they would be allowed to spend the day as they thought proper, only observing the rules, and obeying their teachers. They were soon all in the height of their pleasure.

As I have already explained, the picnic had one unpleasant incident. The honor of being escort to little Carrie had led to a quarrel between her cousin, George Browne and Milton Seymour. There had been hot words and hard blows, as I have said, and as that first trouble on the subject was never forgotten by either boy, I have set it down instead of passing over it as a boyish quarrel. Milton, accustomed to his mother's gentle guidance and reverencing the Holy Scriptures as he had been taught to do, yielded to her reproof and buried the hatchet willingly. George Browne bore him no ill-will now, but he disdained the arguments of Mrs. Seymour. The fight in his opinion was manly, but this talk about the Bible was fit only for women and girls.

"Men and boys always fight, you will see that if you read history," he said to Mrs. Seymour. "It's natural, and as for the Bible saying we ought not to fight, why I am told the Bible has no weight now with educated people. Indeed, I know one teacher who says, the Bible is a bundle of antiquated fables and lies from beginning to end!"

This startled Milton, who, although somewhat of a wild and restless boy, had imbibed from the holy life of his saintly mother, at least an external respect for religion; but the widow, without showing any surprise, requested George to sit down, and asked him who had told him such a dreadful thing.

"Older people than any of us, George, have lived and died believing the precious truths of the Bible, and trusting in the Saviour whom it reveals. Is it right then, for a boy of your years, to condemn the sacred Book which has stood the attacks of bad men in all ages?"

"Well," replied George, "Professor Tynbull lectured last spring at our Lyceum, and he said the whole Book was a pack of lies, and proved it."

"Not so fast, George. How did he prove it?"

"Why, he said the Bible told that a whale swallowed Jonah; but that it was just as likely that Jonah swallowed the whale; because he proved from twenty-nine different naturalists that a whale's throat is so small that it could not swallow anything near as big, so a whale never did or could swallow a man. These big fish stories won't go down with this child," and George kicked out his foot, rubbed his ear, and looked as if his argument was irresistible and unanswerable, just as he had seen his elders do.

"Professor Tynbull may be very learned but he is not fair," said Mrs. Seymour. "Just look George," handing him the Bible. "You see the book says nothing about a whale but that God prepared a fish. Now if he prepared one, you may be sure it was one fit for just the duty required to be done. Don't be too ready to listen to arguments against the Bible. The best people in the world believe it and love it, and those who obey it most fully and carefully live the happiest and most useful lives."

The boy listened and was evidently impressed by the argument, but he was eager to get back to his companions and Mrs. Seymour had too much interest in the happiness of young folks to be willing to spoil their fun at a picnic by a long talk. George's bold assertion must be met at once and on the spot, but she would not keep him from his play a minute longer than was necessary.

"Now run away and have a good time," she said, and George willingly obeyed her. They were all having a good time and the hours sped away as time will when people are thoroughly enjoying themselves. It was not until the sun got low in the summer sky that the boys and girls realized that this grand day was near its close.

Publishers' Announcements.

We have already received applications from a number of churches in small towns and villages, wishing to avail themselves of the opportunity to get a supply of "Gospel Hymn" books at a greatly reduced price. The books are a regular "Gospel Hymns Nos. 1 to 6," Candidates, Music Edition, and our only reason for disposing of the quantity on hand at such attractive figures is that some of the copies have been imperceptibly rubbed during the process of packing. Those who desire to secure copies, singly or in quantities for use in churches, will do well to write very promptly, as the balance of the lot will not last long, and an equally favorable opportunity will never occur.

We wish we could print a tenth part of the offerings that have been written to us by persons who have received our "Library Premiums." While we were sending out by the thousands the sets of ten books, each set in its own substantial case, a few score of the cases were slightly scratched—nothing to mar the set, really, and, of course, no damage to the books. Those scratched sets we send to such as wish them at $1.50 per set. This is a famous chance to get a first-class impact home library, entertaining and thrilling, at very little expense—just such a collection of books as will assure you of pleasant and profitable reading for many months to come. The whole ten volumes aggregate over 1,000 pages, and are as follows:

- The Tea-Table.....T. DeWitt Talmage.
- The Golden Decisions.....Charlotte M. Yonge.
- Prayers and Recitations.....Fannie Fernie.
- Our Treasury.....Bogatzke.
- Children's Portion.....Shoppell.
- How to Get On in the World.....Calhoun.
- Great Stories by Am. Authors.....Hawthorne.
- African Citizens' Handbook.....Mann.
- A Budget of Christmas Tales.....Charles Dickens.
- Four Amusements and Etiquette.....Sandison.

The renewed atrocities in Armenia gives a powerful incentive to every thinking man and woman to become conversant with the history of this great modern anti-Christian empire by the Sultan of Turkey. Rev. F. D. Mearns' book on the Rule of the Turk is pronounced by Mr. Gladstone and other eminent authorities to be the ablest presentation of this modern history of cruelty and persecution that has appeared. It is a handsomely bound and fully illustrated fifty-cent book, but in our estimation our readers may learn the cold, hard truth for themselves as to the treatment of Christian men, women and tender children in Turkey, we have obtained a limited supply of copies which we will forward to any one, post paid, at 25 cents each.

Among the treasures that are greatly prized by the possessors, there is, perhaps, one that is valued for its sacred associations as much as those beautiful slabs of Olive Green from Palestine which we have sent already to very many of our readers and their friends. They are from Mount Olivet, highly polished, and show the wonderfully delicate and rich wood with its rich colorings. We will supply them by mail, postpaid, at twenty-five cents a piece.

Ever, in our own or our forefathers' time, multitudes interested in the study of the Word as now. To study intelligently and profitably, one needs all the light and counsel that can be had; and these are at hand in the form of our little volume of Helps in the Study of the Bible. It is a library of original information and a compendium of the great theologians, scholars, expositors, etc., of the past and present have said so much on the subject that is worth perusing. These Helps, indispensable to the Bible reader and to all who wish to make progress in religious knowledge, can be procured for 25 cents per copy, postpaid, from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The supply is limited, however, and orders should be placed as soon as possible by all who wish the Helps.

Mr. Harvey B. Greene, who made the collection of pressed flowers from Palestine, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offered in such popular form to its subscribers last year as a "Lebanon" has returned from another visit to the Holy Land. He has made, with the assistance of a number of the native Arabs, a very large collection of the flowers of that country, which he has pressed and is now mounting in little booklets. These booklets will make most appropriate gifts for any occasion. Most of the flowers are those referred to in the Bible narrative of the life of Jesus, and in the New Testament. These booklets are published in two sizes—one containing twelve pressed flowers which this spring were growing in Galilee or near Jerusalem—and costing only 5 cents a copy; the second, larger in size and containing sixteen flowers, is to sell for 10 cents. Mr. Greene wishes the names of one thousand persons who will canvass with these beautiful booklets their own town or neighborhood. He should be addressed at 42 S. Wacker Street, Lowell, Mass.

More Armenians Slain.

News comes from Van, Armenia, of the massacre of many Armenians in the villages of that district by Turks and Kurds. The wholesale slaughter is said to have been resumed in June. Miss Kimball states that about 500 were slain. In each village, however, an average of four males fell under the Moslem swords and bullets. Nearly 15,000 fugitives sought refuge in the American Mission premises at Van. All the missionaries' houses are filled with these terror-stricken people. The situation is desperate, and further slaughter is feared.

During the week these additional contributions have been received to aid the destitute in Armenia:

Consumption

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you, Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily, Spurgeon.

—Westwood, Beulah Hill, England.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order for $1.00 bottle of Congreve's Balsamic Elixir.

Requests for Prayer.

AT the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on July 19, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of Relatives and Friends.

"Wife," Green Brier, Tenn., earnestly desires prayer that she may see the desire of her heart in the conversion of her husband.—N. B., Slane, Ky., that her only brother might be brought to Christ.—T. L. J., New York, that a dear friend who has periodical fits of intemperance may go to Christ for strength to resist and find grace for his time of need.—"Believer," Tenn., on behalf of a beloved son, that he and his bosom friend may become children of God.—"A Sister," Illinois, that her prodigal brother may be restored to his family and saved for eternity.—"Hopeful," Cincinnati, O., that his brothers and their families and one who is very dear might be brought into Christ's kingdom.—A. F. M., Halldale, Me., that God would answer the many prayers she has offered for the conversion of her husband and two sons and two daughters.—"Reader," Yuba Co., Cal., that her husband, whose fondness for wine is hindering his conversion, may be delivered and made a new creature in Christ Jesus.—E. N. B., Millport, Pa., for the conversion of father, mother, three sisters and a brother-in-law.—S. J. M., Myrtle, Miss., that two old men once professors but now very wicked might be brought to penitence and faith; also, that a young man who has been dishonest might repent and be saved.—D. B. W., Oil City, Pa., that two sons who are church members, but are not saved, might be renewed by the Holy Spirit.—W. C., Brookfield, O., for the conversion of his father.—A. G. L., Jonesville, Ind., that a young man who is relying on his own strength for the power to lead an upright life may be led to look to Christ for help and have a new heart.—E. K. S., Gaylord, Mich., that two sons may be converted and become faithful servants of Christ.—"Reader," Bridgeton, N. J., that an aged father may turn to Christ for salvation before he dies.—R. A. H., Lakewood, N. J., for the conversion of three brothers and two sisters-in-law, and that they and their families may all be members of Christ's Kingdom.—"Constant Reader," Texas, for the conversion of children.—"Reader," Kansas City, Mo., that an unconverted brother may repent of his sins and turn to the Lord.—"Broken Hearted," Price's Forks, Va., that one who is dearly loved may turn from frivolity and pleasure and seek the Lord and may be led to fulfil his promises.—"Mother," Leesburg, Va., for the conversion of her eldest son and that he may become a faithful, useful Christian.—"Anxious Mother," Prairie City, Ill., that one who is distracted by business perplexities may seek the Lord in his trouble and become a true Christian.—"Anxious Mother," Annapolis, Md., that a son who is growing worldly and neglecting his studies may have a new heart given to him.—"Constant Reader," Lodi, O., that a whole family, now strangers to Christ, may be saved; also for a family in the West that they, too, might become the children of God.—"One Who Believes," on behalf of several dear friends for whom prayer is being offered that they might be saved, especially one who is gifted with many talents which might be made useful in the Master's service.—"Young Christian," for the conversion of father and mother.—"Sad Father," Baltimore, Md., that his eldest son may be relieved of the burden that is causing him to do wrong and may become a child of God.—"Believer in Prayer," Lynn, Mass., that a young girl who has been a Christian but has fallen into sin may turn again and seek the Lord for the salvation of her soul.—"Sister," Troy, O., that two sons of a praying mother might renounce drink and all wicked ways and turn to the Lord; and that a daughter for whom many prayers have been offered might give herself to Christ.

For the Restoration of Health.—"Mother in Israel," Herkimer, N. Y., that her daughter who has been an invalid, may be healed of the Lord.—S., Baltimore, Md., that a young man who has been in bad health for a number of years may recover.—"Young Christian," that an afflicted brother and sister may both regain their health.—"Reader," Kansas City, Mo., that a dear sister who is afflicted and has lost her hearing may be restored.—"Constant Reader," Texas, who has pulmonary symptoms, asks prayer for divine healing.—"One who trusts," New York, that a mother and two young men who are all sick, may recover, and that two girls suffering from painful diseases may be healed.—R. A. H., Lakewood, N. J., that an invalid sister might be recovered of severe sickness.—"Afflicted Sister," Arkansas City, Kans., who has four small children badly needing their mother's care, begs for earnest prayer that God would raise her from a bed of sickness and give her the strength she needs.—The following persons also ask prayer that God would recover them of their various diseases: "Believer," Tenn.; A. B., Odon, Ind.; D. O. W., Oil City, Pa.; W. C., Brookfield, O.; H. Miller; S. A. B., Marietta, N. Y.; Reader, Bridgeton, N. J.

Many other letters containing requests for prayer have been received which were without name, initials, place or any means of identification.

The Old Church.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

WANDER' round its ruined walls,
I enter its old door;
I kneel in my accustomed place
On its uneven floor.

As fancy takes me gently back,
Back to the good old days,
Lo, suddenly around me rise
Voices of prayer and praise.

The old friends come from the dead past
And kneel upon the floor,
Their voices rise in prayer and praise,
Just as they did of yore.

The solemn exhortations rise
Mingled with praise and prayer,
And sinners kneel with saints, and pray
For strength the Cross to bear.

I hear the solemn tolling bell,
The sacred aisles we tread,
And take one last long, loving look
At our dear, sainted dead.

Oh! dear old church, thy crumbling walls
Soon in the dust must lie,
But love will ever to thee cling, author has selected the most striking and important parts of the story, and has read those parts with care and enthusiasm. What is dull and commonplace in our story has been eliminated from the glowing narrative in the People's History. The vividness is retained, the useless has given place to the useful, the all to the romantic.
Thy influence cannot die.

Among other important features this book contains portraits of prominent Statesmen, including: William McKinley, Whitelaw Reid, David B. Hill, A. P. Gorman, Rev. Chas. H. Parkes, President Cleveland, General John B. Hood, Gen'l James B. Weaver, Gen'l Nelson A. Miles and Others.

Remarkable Conversion.

Sunday School Missionary Tells How a Doubter Was Brought to Christ.

HERE are opportunities of doing good constantly occurring in our Sunday School missionary work, and in a great variety of ways. As I was canvassing portions of Grundy and adjacent counties, a few years ago, I made a little railroad station, called Hickory, headquarters. It was suited to my needs, not because it was an attractive place for it was not; but because it was a missionary ground, was itself a place, having neither Sunday School church; and it was the most convenient office near where I was laboring. There was no hotel in the village, and I obtained meals at a private boarding-house, which was cheap in more senses than one. There lived in the village a man who was very talkative, friendly, but ignorant of the gospel. He had received an injury when he thought would terminate fatally, and probably very soon, though he was not confined to his house from his accidental wound. He was anxious about his eternal welfare. One day as I came into the village he met me and said:

"Brother Sharp, I'm going to join the Roman Catholic Church,—it's the oldest faith in the world."

I had only time to say a few words to him as to his spiritual condition, and then went on my way. There was a section-house near the village and the section hands on the railroad were mostly Catholics. I was told their priest, in his visits to them, had indoctrinated the invalid. Upon my return from a town the neighboring county school-houses, late one evening, the sick man's wife asked me to conduct a service at their house that night, and I consented gladly. So the small room was filled by the villagers. I opened the service, and was proceeding to show from the Scriptures that salvation was of grace, through faith in the adorable Jesus, when the invalid exclaimed:

"That's so, and that's the reason I'm going to join the Catholic Church."

Without replying to the interruption, I proceeded to show that the offer of salvation was full and free, and that pardon was instantaneous to every sinner who turned from his sins to God and trusts in Christ.

"That's so, too," exclaimed our friend, "that's another reason why I'm going to join the Catholic Church."

I answered that those truths were not peculiar to the Catholic Church, but were also to Protestants.

"Vell," said he, "what do you think of the Catholic Church?"

He was anxious to tell him, and all present in such a manner as to benefit him. So I answered, "If I were to tell you it might be painful to you? You might think I had no right to speak against the church of your choice in your house?"

"No," said he, "it will not offend me. I really want to know what you think of the Catholic Church."

I replied, "It is Christ who saves. Simply joining a church, whether Protestant or Catholic, will not save you. You must be born again, born from above, and that blessing is obtained by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ. (John 1:13; 3:14-16.) No long ago I read an account of the death of a Catholic prelate, from which I learned that he was very earnest in his devotions to the Virgin Mary, in preparation for death. The blessed Jesus says, 'No man cometh unto the Father but by me.' (John 14:6.) No man come can come to the Father by the Virgin Mary. If the prelate, who at that time was a leading man in the Catholic Church in the United States, was so blinded by the errors of Romanism at a time of such solemnity, how perilous must be the darkness of others of that church less intelligent than he? It is written: 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.' (Luke 4:8) Again it is written, 'Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath. . . . Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them.' (Ex. 20:4, 5.) To do these forbidden things is idolatry."

Such was the purport of my remarks. I believe the Holy Spirit blessed the truth; for a short time afterward he went to the nearest Baptist Church, confessed his faith in Christ and was received into fellowship. He did not die of his wound, but at last accounts was alive and leading, it is believed, a Christian life.

The fruits of this missionary work are garnered by the various Protestant denominations. The new schools I organized, and the feeble ones aided, in that part of the State, were numerous.

Persecutions in Persia.

Jessie Malck Yonan, the eloquent young Nestorian medical missionary, recently addressed large church audiences in the Western States on the American and Nestorian persecutions. Speaking at Wooster, O., Mr. Yonan said that at one time the war of the Moslems against the Christians in Persia had been so fierce that seventy Nestorian bishops were beheaded in a single day for refusing to accept Islam. Mr. Yonan's father was one of the first pupils who studied under the American missionaries in Persia.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the nostrils, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, refreshing to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It is highly recommended by physicians, clergymen, public speakers and thousands who have been helped and cured.

ELEGANT FRUIT-DISH FREE!

SPECIAL SUMMER OFFER.

Good only till Sept. 1st, 1896.

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past two years know that when the Leonard Mfg. Co. make an offer—it is bound to be a grand bargain, no matter how impossible it may seem. Our name has become a household word all over the continent—in fact, is a guarantee of honest goods and square dealing.

Now we will make an offer that will startle you:

This elegant Fruit-Dish (see cut) is strictly high-grade, and has an elaborate design of the latest and most exquisite finish; the bowl is an excellent imitation of cut glass, and the pedestal is triple silver-plated on hard white metal. It stands 14 inches high and is a beautiful ornament for any table or sideboard. The dish would cost you at any jewelry store from $4.00 to $6.00. We offer to send it free, absolutely free to any one who will do a little work for us. The work we ask you to do is not hard; it can be done right in your own neighborhood. Simply call on your friends and show them our Elegant World's Fair Souvenir Tea Spoons. Nearly every one you call on will want a set of them. Secure orders for six (6) sets of our souvenir spoons at 99c per set and send us the amount ($5.94), and we will, immediately on receipt, ship the spoon and with it this handsome Fruit or Berry-Dish, as a premium. Remember we charge nothing for the dish. It is entirely free.

Evidences of good taste and refinement are perhaps better displayed at the table than elsewhere; the linen, silver china and glassware all indicate the ignorant or educated taste; not always so much from the intrinsic value of the article (as that only suggests the wealth of the possessor), as from their worth in utility and beauty. This premium will be a once recognized for its beauty and uses. The glass portion is an excellent imitation of a piece of cut glass worth about $25.00; it is detachable from the triple-silver-plated pedestal, thus permitting it to be used for other purposes and also making the cleaning a mere pleasure.

The World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons have been advertised so widely during the last two years that they are well known throughout the land. A set is composed of 6 full size Teaspoons, heavy triple-plated on white metal, with the bowl gold plated both inside and outside. They are not the common washed-over stuff, but are stamped "Leonard Mfg. Co. A. 1," which is a guarantee of reliability and square dealing. Each bowl contains a different building. There are 12 different buildings, as follows:

Set No. 2 comprises the Manufacturers, Horticultural, Woman's, Fisheries, Machinery, and Transportation buildings. Set 3 includes the Administration, Art, Agricultural, Electrical, Mining and Government buildings.

Be sure to specify in your order how many sets of each kind you desire. Sets will not be broken, so do not ask it.

The price at which we sell these spoons (6 for 99c) is so remarkably low that every housekeeper can afford to have a set. Remember these spoons are not Orange Spoons, nor "After Dinner" Coffee Spoons, but are regular, full size teaspoons.

This is such a grand offer that we caution you not to delay getting your orders in at once. Under no circumstance will this offer hold good after September 1st, 1896. It is made only for the summer trade and the time will positively not be extended.

We know you will be delighted with the goods; read what our customers think of them. We receive, unsolicited, hundreds of letters like the following, daily:

LOWELL, Mass., June 15, 1896.

GENTLEMEN: The Souvenir Spoons for Mrs. Emma Brown came to hand this A.M. She is very much pleased with them and particularly so with your promptness. Accept my own thanks. Yours truly,

P. PHILETUS BURNHAM.

Those Souvenir Teaspoons are a grand bargain at 99c. I sent for sets Nos. 2 and 3 and have used them. To say that I am satisfied does not give the right expression. I believe that I am proud of them. I would like to work for Leonard Manufacturing Company and secure some of the prize pieces, but could not act in the capacity of agent as I seldom go away from home—being very deaf—but when I see anything I want recommended, and have the money to pay for it, I am not afraid to invest.

VAN'S BRAVE MISSIONARY BAND.

Their Courage Saves Thousands of Armenian Lives During the Three Days' Massacre—The City in Sore Straits—Dr. Kimball to Retire.

THE FAMOUS "ROCK OF VAN."

WHAT has long been dreaded in Van has at last taken place. The red wave of massacre, which twice swept over the hills and villages of Armenia in two years, had till now spared the ancient city by the lake, and it was hoped that the Armenians of Van might escape the fate of their brothers and sisters in the interior. But the hope was vain. Many during the last few months the pillaging Turkish hordes swept up and down the plains of Van, and came up to the very gates of the city; but the Turkish Vali, or Governor, succeeded in controlling both Kurds without an Turkish soldier within, and the trouble was again and again averted. This was the situation until the middle of June, when matters reached a climax, and the streets of Van for miles ran with the blood of innocent victims of Turkish persecution. Briefly told, the story of the massacre of Van is as follows:

Van has a very large and influential Armenian population, a majority of whom are able to live at peace with all the world, the Turks included. In the city, however, there is a patriotic revolutionist party, small in number but intensely active and aggressive, and the attitude of its members in their public demonstrations against the Turks had greatly excited the Moslem population. On Monday, June 15, a collision occurred between Turks and Armenians, during which the Vali of the city sent troops to protect the premises occupied by the American missionaries, Dr. Grace N. Kimball, Dr. Reynolds, and their associates. On the following day, the Turks began burning and looting Armenian houses, and the British Consul, Major Williams, in order further to protect the American Mission, put his flag on the building and made it his Consulate for the time being.

One of the missionaries at Van, who kept a diary of the events of those exciting days, writes that on Monday the distant sound of guns could be heard at the Mission, and that the dense smoke indicated that many buildings were burning. This continued all day on Tuesday, and refugees were continually filing into the Mission, where the women and children were ful sword slashes on head and neck. The sufferers were of all ages and both sexes, and they had woful stories to tell of the murder of husbands, fathers, and sons. Again the authorities gave the missionaries assurance that the troubles were over and many of the people returned to their homes or to nearby houses, but thousands remained at the Mission. At 3 A.M. on Saturday the firing was renewed, the Turks using cannon against the Armenians, in some parts of the city where the latter made an attempt at a defence. The Armenians at one time during the struggle, secured possession of the guns, but were unable to hold them. After a time, the heavy firing abated and the Turks, who had been assisted in their attacks by the Kurds—with whom, as usual, they made common cause—withdraw, the Kurds also departing at the same time. As they retired, they pillaged the dwellings of the Armenians on the way.

At that time it was not known how serious the results of the uprising had been. The missionaries were so engrossed in caring for the fugitives and aiding the wounded that they gave little attention to mat-menian village is uninjured, and most of them are entirely destroyed."

From other reliable sources, it was learned that, when the Kurds in force surrounded the city, Major Williams, the British Consul, gave orders for all Armenians to flee to the Mission premises. This, and his prompt action in hoisting his flag there, and making it his headquarters, doubtless saved thousands of lives. But he was powerless to prevent the robbing and murder that were under full headway in the city. It would appear that the Turkish officials at first had intended only a demonstration in force against the band of Armenian revolutionists known as the Huntchagists, (who had many followers in Van), and that they had surrounded the Armenian quarters with troops hoping to find some of the Huntchagists, or to discover some hidden stores of arms; but the officials soon found out they could not control the soldiers, and violence and massacre soon reigned unchecked. It is admitted that the burning of the houses was ordered by the government, being intended as a punishment for the revolutionists. Leading Armenians begged the Vali to be merciful and he, in reply, offered to pardon the people and commanded them to go quickly to their homes.

When Dr. Reynolds announced this, the women became hysterical. Some laughed and others wept. It was ascertained later that not less than five hundred Armenians and probably two hundred Moslems had been killed since the beginning of the outbreak. It was an almost miraculous escape from a slaughter which might have been greater than those of Oorfa and Harpoot.

In the villages surrounding Van, however, no such clemency was displayed and there was no benign influence at work to check the lust of murder and pillage. All the horrors of the earlier massacres were permitted to remain. That evening it was reported that an order had come from Constantinople commanding the irregularities to cease, and this restored confidence to some extent. Next day (Wednesday) the alarm was intensified by the news that the Kurds were approaching the city, and Turkish troops went out to prevent their approach. On Thursday, great crowds of refugees continued to arrive. Many were wounded, and Drs. Kimball and Reynolds cared for them. Some had frightters occurring outside of Van. So great had been the crowds of fugitives seeking the shelter of the Mission that the gardens were trampled out of recognition. As the missionary's diary tersely stated: "the gardens were a waste, the houses like pigsties and the school-rooms worse. As many as 15,000 had found shelter on the premises. Hundreds from the nearby villages came in, naked, starving and wounded, adding to the numbers of the hungry, homeless throngs. I doubt if a single Ar-

ANOTHER CHANCE.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Eccl. 11: 3, "If the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be."

HERE is a hovering hope in the minds of a vast multitude of people that there will be an opportunity in the next world of correcting the mistakes of this; that however complete a shipwreck we may make of our earthly life, it will be on a beach up which we may walk to a palace: that as the defendant may lose his case in a Circuit Court and appeal it and have it go up to the Supreme Court or Court of Chancery and all the costs thrown over on the other party, so a man may lose his case in this world, but in the higher jurisdiction of eternity have the decision of the earthly case set aside, all the costs remitted and the defendant be triumphant forever.

The object of my sermon is to show you that common sense declares with the text that such an expectation is chimerical. "If the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be." There are those who say that if the impenitent and unforgiven man enters the next world and sees the disaster, as a result of that disaster he will turn, the distress the cause of his reformation; but we have ten thousand instances all around about us of people who have done wrong and disaster suddenly came upon them—did the disaster heal them? No, they went on. There is a man flung of dissipations. The doctor says to him: "Now, my friend, if you don't stop drinking and don't stop this fast life you are living, you will die." The patient thanks the physician for his warning and gets better; he begins to sit up, begins to walk around the room, begins to go to business and takes the same round of grog-shops where he got his morning dram and his evening dram and the drams between. Down again. Same doctor. Same physical anguish. Same medical warning. But now the sickness is more protracted, the liver more obstinate, the stomach more irritable, the digestive organs more rebellious. But still, under medical skill, he gets better, goes forth, commits the same sacrilege against his physical health. Sometimes he wakes up to see what he is doing, and he realizes he is destroying his family and that his life is a perpetual perjury against his marriage vows, and that that broken-hearted woman is so different from the roseate wife he married that her old schoolmates do not recognize her on the street, and that his sons are going out in life under the taunt of a father's drunkenness, and that his daughters are going out in life under the scarification of a disreputable ancestry. His nerves are all a-jangle. From crown of head to sole of foot he is a-jangle. Where is he? He is in hell on earth. Does it stop him? Ah! no. After awhile delirium tremens pours out upon his pillow a whole jungle of hissing reptiles. His screams horribly the neighbors as he dashes out of bed crying: "Take these things off me!" He is drinking down the comfort of his family, the education of his children, their prospects for this life and perhaps their prospects for the life to come. Pale and convalescent he sits up. Physician says to him: "Now, my good fellow, I am going to have a plain talk with you. If you ever have an attack of this kind again you will die. I can't save you, and all the doctors in creation can't save you." The patient gets up, starts out, goes the same round of dissipation and is down again; but this time medicines do not touch his case. Consultations of physicians say there is no hope. Death ends the scene. That process of inebriation and physical suffering and medical warning and dissolution is taking place within a stone's throw of where you sit and in every neighborhood of Christendom. Pain does not reform. Suffering does not cure. What is true in regard to one sin is true in regard to all sins, and yet men are expecting in the next life there will be opportunity for purgatorial regeneration. Take up the printed reports of the prisons of the United States and find that the vast majority of the criminals were there before, some for two times, three times, four times, six times. Punished again and again, but they go right on. Millions of incidents and instances working the other way, and yet men think that in the next world punishment will work out for them salvable effects. Why, you and I cannot imagine any worse torture from another world than we have seen men in in this world, and without any salutary consequence.

Furthermore, the prospect of reformation in another world is more improbable than here. Do you not realize the fact that a man starts in this world with the innocence of infancy? In the other case, starting in the other world, he starts with the accumulated bad habits of a lifetime. Is it not to be expected that you could build a better ship out of new timber than out of an old hulk that has been ground up in the breakers? If starting with comparative innocence the man does not become godly, is it possible that starting with sin a seraph can be evolved? Is there not more prospect that a sculptor will make a finer statue out of a block of pure, white Parian marble than out of a black rock that has been cracked and twisted and split and scarred with the storms of a half century? Could you not write a last will and testament, or write a deed, or write an important document on a pure white sheet of paper easier than you could write it upon a sheet scribbled all over with infamy and blotted and torn from top to bottom? And yet there are those who are so uncommon-sensical as to believe that though a man starts in this world with infancy and its innocence and turns out badly, in the next world he can start with a dead failure and turn out well. "But," say some people, "we ought to have another chance in the next world because our life here is so very brief; we scarcely have room to turn around between the cradle and the grave, the wood of the one almost striking against the marble of the other. We ought to have another chance because of the brevity of this life." My friends, do you know what made the ancient deluge a necessity? It was the longevity of the antediluvians. They were worse in the second century than in the first, and worse when they got three hundred years old, and worse at four hundred, and worse at five hundred, and worse at six hundred, and worse at eight hundred; until the world had to be washed and scoured and scrubbed and soaked and sunk and anchored a whole month under water before it was fit for decent people to live in. I have seen many pictures of old Time with his scythe to cut, but I never saw any picture of Time with a chest of medicines to heal. Seneca said that in the first few years of his public life Nero was set up as an example of clemency and kindness, but he got worse and worse, the path descending, until at sixty-eight years of age he was the suicide. If eight hundred years of lifetime could not cure the antediluvians of their iniquity, I undertake to say that all the ages of eternity would be only prolongation of depravity. "But," says some one, "in the next life the evil surroundings will be withdrawn and good influences will be substituted, and hence, expurgation, sublimation, glorification." But you must remember that the righteous, all their sins forgiven, pass right up into a beatific state, and then having passed up into the beatific state, not needing any other chance, that will leave all those who have never been forgiven, and who were impenitent, alone—alone! and where are the salvable influences to come from? Can it be expected that Dr. Duff, who spent his whole life in pointing the Hindoos to heaven, and Dr. Abeel, who spent his life in evangelizing China, and that Judson, who spent his life in preaching the Gospel to Burmah—can it be expected that they will be sent down from some celestial Missionary Society to educate and to save those who wasted their earthly existence? No. We are told distinctly that all missionary and evangelistic influences will be ended forever, and the good, having passed up to their beatific state, all the morally bankrupt will be together, and where are the salvable influences to come from? Will a specked or bad apple put in a barrel of diseased apples make the other apples good? Will one who is down be able to lift others up? Will those who have miserably failed in the business of this life be able to pay the debts of other spiritual insolvents? Will a million wrongs make one right? Poneropolis was the city where King Rufus of Thracia, put all bad people of his kingdom, and whenever there were iniquitous people found in any part of the land they were all sent to Poneropolis. It was the great capital of wickedness. Snppose a man or a woman had opened a primary school in Poneropolis, would the parents of other cities have sent their children there to be educated and reformed?

If a man in this world was surrounded with temptation, in the next world, all the righteous having passed up into the beatific state, the association will be more deteriorating, depreciating and down. You would not send to a cholera or yellow fever hospital a man for his health, and the great lazaretto of the future, in which are gathered the diseased and the plague-struck, will be a poor place for moral recovery. The Count of Chateaubriand, in order to make his child courageous, made him sleep in the turrets of the castle, where the winds howled and spectres were said to haunt the place. The mother and the sisters almost died of fright, but the son afterwards gives his account, and he says: "That gave me nerves of steel, and gave me courage that has never faltered." But, my friends, I do not think the turrets of darkness or the spectral world swept by sirocco and euroclydon, will ever prepare a soul for the eternal land of sunshine. I wonder what is the curriculum in the College Inferno, where a man having been prepared by enough sin, enters and goes up from freshman of iniquity to sophomore of abomination, and on up, from sophomore to junior, and from junior to senior, and day of graduation comes, and the diploma is signed by Satan the president, and all the professional denials attest the fact that the candidate has been a sufficient time under their drill, and then enters heaven. Pandemonium, a preparatory school for celestial admission! Ah, my friends, while Satan and his cohorts have fitted a vast multitude for it, they never fitted one soul for happiness never.

Again, I wish you further to notice another chance in another world means the ruin of this. Now, suppose a wicked man is assured that after a lifetime of wickedness, he can fix it all right in the future. That would be the demoralization of society, that would be the demoralization of the human race. There are men who are now kept on the limits of sin by their fear. The fear that if we are id and unforgiven here it will not be all with us in the next existence, is the influence that keeps civilization from rushing back into semi-barbarism, and keeps semi-barbarism from rushing back to midnight savagery, and keeps midnight savagery from rushing back into extinction. Now, the man is kept on the limits of sin. But this idea coming into his mind, this idea of another chance, he says, "to, now; I'll get out of this world all right is in it. Come gluttony and revenge and uncleanness and all sensualities, and I'll upon me. It may abbreviate my early life by dissoluteness, but that will give me heavenly indulgence on a larger scale in a shorter length of time. I'll overtake the righteous before long, I'll only come in heaven a little late, a little will be a little more fortunate than those who have behaved themselves on earth and then went straight to the bosom of God, because I will see more and have wider excursion, and I will come to heaven via Gehenna, via Sheol!" Hallelu! Readers! Another chance in the next world means free license and the demolition of this. Suppose you had a case in court, and all the judges and all the attorneys agreed in telling you the first trial of it—it would be tried twice—the first trial would not be of very much importance, but the second trial would decide everything. On which trial would you put the most expenditure? on which trial would you employ the ablest counsel? which trial would you be most anxious to have the attendance of all the witnesses? "Oh," you would say, "if there are two trials, and the first trial does not amount to much, the second trial decides everything, everything depending upon that, I must have the most eloquent attorney, and I must have all my witnesses present, and I will expend my money on that." If these men who are impenitent and who are wicked felt there were two trials, and the first was of no very great importance, and the second trial was one of vast and infinite importance, all preparations for eternity would be premature, post-funeral, post-sepulchral, and this world would be jerked off into impotency and godlessness. Another chance in another world means the demolition of this world.

Furthermore, my friends—for I am preaching to myself as well as to you—are on the same level, and though the platform be a little higher than the people it is only for convenience, and that may the better speak to the people; are all on the same platform, and I am talking to my soul while I talk to your friends, why another chance in another world when we have declined so many chances in this? Suppose you spread a banquet and you invite a vast number of friends, and among others you send an invitation to a man who disregards it, treats it in an obnoxious way. During twenty years you give twenty banquets a year; and you invite your friends, and every time you invite that man, who disregards your invitation sends back some indignity. After awhile you move into a larger house and more luxuriant surroundings, and you your friends, but you do not invite the man to whom twenty times you sent an invitation to the smaller house. Are you to blame? You would only make yourself absurd before God and man to send that man another invitation. For twenty years he has been declining your offers and sending insult for your kindness all courtesy, and can he blame you? Can he come up to your house on the night of the banquet? Looking up and seeing it is a finer house, will he have any right to say: "Let me in. I declined all those other offers, but this is a larger house, a brighter house, a more luxuriant abode. Let me in. Give me another chance?" God has spread a banquet of his grace before us. For three hundred and sixty-five days of every year, since we knew the difference between our right hand and our left, he has invited us by his Providence all by his Spirit. Suppose we decline all these offers and all this kindness. Now the banquet is spread in a larger place, in the heavenly palace. Invitations are sent out, but no invitation is sent to us. Why? Because we declined all those other banquets. Will God be to blame? A ship is to sail for Hamburg. You want to go to Germany by that line. You see the advertisement of the steamer's sailing. You sit it for two weeks. You see it in the morning papers and you see it in the evening papers; you see it placarded on the walls. Circulars are thrown into your office telling you all about that steamer. One day you come down on the wharf and the steamer has swung out into the stream. You say: "Oh, that isn't fair. Come back, swing up again to the docks. Throw the plank ashore that I may come on board. Isn't fair. I want to go to Germany by that steamer. Give me another chance." There is a magnificent offer for heaven. It has been anchored within our sight year after year, and year after year, and year after year, and all the benign voices of earth and heaven have urged us to get on board, since it may sail at any moment. Suppose we let that opportunity sail away, and then we look out and say: "Send back that opportunity; I want to take it; it isn't treating me fairly. Give me another chance." Why, my brother, you might as well go out and stand on the highlands at the Navesink three days after the Majestic has gone out, and shout: "Captain, come back; I want to go to Liverpool on the Majestic. Come back to the sea and through the Narrows and to the docks. Give me another chance." You might as well do that as, after the opportunity of heaven has sped away, to get it back again. Just think of it! Come on me yesterday in my study with overwhelming impressiveness. Just think of it. All heaven offered us as a gratuity for a whole lifetime, and yet we wanting truth against God, saying: "Give me another chance!" There ought to be, there will be, no such thing as posthumous opportunity.

You see common-sense agrees with my text in saying that "if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall lie." You see this idea lifts this world from an unimportant way-station to a platform of stupendous issues, and makes eternity whirl around this hour. Oh, my soul! my soul! Only one trial, and the preparations for that trial to be made in this world, or never made at all. Oh, my soul! my soul! You see this sums up all the emphasis and all the climax and all the destinies into this life. No other chance. Oh, how that intensifies the value and the importance of this chance. Alexander and his army used to come around a city, and they would kindle a great light, with the understanding that as long as that light was burning the city might surrender, and all would be well, but if they let that light go out, then the uttering rams would swing against the walls and there would come disaster and annihilation. Oh, my friends, all you and need to do to prepare for eternal safety is just to surrender to the King and Conqueror, Christ. Surrender hearts, surrender life, surrender everything. The great light keeps burning, light kindled by the wood of the Cross, light flaming up against the dark night of our sin and sorrow. Oh, let us surrender before the light goes out, and with it our last opportunity of making our peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.

A dream. I am in the burnished judgment hall on the last day. The great white throne is lifted, but the Judge has not yet taken it. While we are waiting for his arrival I hear the immortals in conversation. "What are you waiting for?" says a soul that went up from Madagascar to a soul that went up from America. The latter responds: "I was in America forty years ago, and I heard the Gospel preached, and I had plenty of Bibles in my house, and from the time that I knelt at my mother's knee in prayer until my last hour, I had great opportunities; but I did not improve them, and I am here to-day waiting for another chance." "Strange, strange," says the soul just come up from Madagascar. "Strange, Why, I never heard the Gospel call but once in all my life, and I accepted it, and I don't want another chance." "What are you waiting for?" says one who on earth had very feeble intellect to one who had great brain and whose voice was silvery, and who had sceptres of power. The latter replies: "I had great power on earth. I must admit: and I mastered languages and I mastered libraries, and colleges conferred upon me learned titles, and my name was a synonym for eloquence and power; but somehow I neglected the matters of my soul, and I must confess to you I am here to-day waiting for another chance."

Now, the ground trembles with the advancing chariot. The great folding doors of the burnished hall of judgment are thrown open. "Stand back," cry the ushers, "and let the Judge of quick and dead pass through." He takes the throne. He looks off upon the throngs of nations come to the last judgment, come to the only judgment, and one flash from the throne reveals each man's history to himself, and reveals it to all the others. And then the Judge says, "Divide!" and the burnished walls echo it, "Divide!" and the guides angelic answer, "Divide!" and the immortals are rushing this way and that, until there is an aisle between them, a great aisle; and then a vacuum, widening, and widening and widening, until the Judge looks to one side of that vacuum, and addresses the throng, and says: "Let him that is righteous be righteous still, and let him that is holy be holy still." And then, turning to the throng on the other side of the vacuum, he says: "Let him that is unjust be unjust still, and let him that is filthy be filthy still." And then he stretches out both hands, one toward the throng on each side the vacuum, and says: "If the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall lie!" And then I hear something jar with a great sound. It is the closing of the Book of Judgment. The Judge ascends the stairs behind the throne. The Hall of the last Assize is cleared and shut. The High Court of Eternity adjourned forever.

Among "Blanket Indians."

A Sunday School Missionary of the Am. S. S. Union Tells of his Work among Them.

"OLD JOE."

Washington, Mr. Armstrong writes some very interesting facts concerning the red men known as the "Blanket Indians," and also regarding the once numerous and powerful Spokane tribe. The veteran of the Spokanes is "Old Joe" whose portrait is given on this page.

"Where Spokane City now is," writes Mr. Armstrong, "was once their hunting ground. Joe was friendly to the whites, and would reveal to them at times the treachery of other Indians of his tribe. He eventually assumed the garb of the white man, but as you see he has fantastically adopted a lady's hat, trimmed with feathers, though he still wears moccasins. This photograph was taken among the rocks near Spokane City. Joe is very old, but no one knows his age, although it is supposed he is over a hundred. The other picture is that of two Indians of the Nez Percés tribe and was taken in Colfax. These are the 'Blanket Indians,' dressed in their holiday attire. This tribe was formerly very hostile toward the whites, and, although many experiments have been made, it has been found almost impossible to civilize them.

"On the Blue Mountains, about thirty miles east of Colfax, I organized a Sunday School among the pines. It is situated in a lumber camp with a saw-mill close by. The people have been gathering there from time to time, attracted by the growing lumber business, and they have been rather a rough class, with but little respect for the Sabbath. They appeared to know little about the nature of a religious service. We are now located here at Spangle, and there is not a Sunday School in any school-house adjacent to this town in any direction, except two which I organized last Sunday."

This is the class of work these devoted missionaries are accomplishing year by year—spreading the Gospel among the adults and the children on our frontier or in the settlements on mountains and in lone valleys, where no one has carried the message of light and love to either white man or red.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

Van's Brave Missionary Band.

repeated in aggravated form, and it is estimated that nearly 12,000 Armenians were ruthlessly butchered, churches were desecrated and burned, dwellings laid in ashes, and thousands of inoffensive and defenceless people perished. Nothing could be done by the Vali of Van to save the villages. It is said that in forty villages, every male over eight years old was put to death by the Kurds — the same class of mountain bandits that figured in the great massacres of Harpoot, Dalvoreeg, Sassoun and other fields of slaughter last year. At the latest accounts the situation in Van and neighborhood was distressing in the extreme. Thousands of women and children, half clad and emaciated from fasting and exposure, are still at the Mission and it is not possible to care for more than a part of this vast army of pleading sufferers. Many seemed stunned by the heavy calamity. The state of the children is not less pitiful than that of the mothers.

Worn out by the prolonged anxiety, and the arduous duties of her medical and missionary work, Dr. Kimball has announced her intention of retiring from the Armenian field and returning as soon as possible to the United States. Few laborers have worked more faithfully and successfully, and few have remained so long continuously, without an interval of rest and vacation. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are familiar with the story of Dr. Kimball's heroism during the trying months of last summer and winter; how, with the aid of her associates, she conducted one of the grandest relief works ever known in the history of Christian philanthropy, and devised a system of industrial aid as simple as it was successful. Of the sixteen relief stations opened in Armenia by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, that of Van was the largest, and Dr. Kimball distributed upward of $15,000 of the Fund, affording aid to a multitude of the distressed, and saving thousands of lives. In view of the unprecedented suffering in Van, owing to the late massacre, and desiring to have Dr. Kimball remain in charge of the relief work during the present crisis, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on July 27 cabled her as follows:

Your withdrawal causes the greatest sorrow. Will a new pledge of $10,000 toward the relief work justify your remaining?

It is doubtless true that the work of the Van missionaries among the sufferers must now necessarily be greatly hindered by lack of funds. Before the massacre, the relief work had been gradually diminishing; and it was hoped that affairs might soon reach a normal condition. This hope has been shattered and it can truly be said of Van that its last state is worse than the first.

Our illustrations accompanying this article are from photographs taken by Rev. F. D. Greene, lately a missionary in Armenia, and which have never before been published. On the first page, the central picture shows the buildings occupied by the American missionaries. To the left is the Girls' School, under the charge of Misses Frazer and Huntington. On the right is Dr. Kimball's Dispensary and the rooms of the lady missionaries. In the foreground are a number of persons connected with the Mission in various capacities. Mrs. Greene sits in a carriage on the left, next to a group of native young women, boarders of the Girls' School, with Miss Frazer standing in the centre. Further to the right are patients awaiting their turn to be treated at the dispensary. Dr. Kimball stands by the horse's head on the right of the group. The mission is situated on the eastern edge of the city. Another illustration shows the famous "rock of Van," the natural fortress which, rising like a camel's back, sheer out of the plain to a height of one hundred feet, is crowned with an ancient citadel and fortifications.

Van was the first station opened by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund, and in view of its new and terrible misfortune, we believe that those of our readers who were so deeply interested in the work there last spring and early summer, will esteem it a privilege once again to sustain the hands of our missionaries there with their prayers and their offerings. Any sums sent to us for this purpose will be duly forwarded, by cable per American Board as formerly, to Dr. Kimball at Van.

Contributions to the Fund are acknowledged on page 606 of this issue.

Absalom's Rebellion.

Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 23. II. Sam. 15: 1-12. Golden Text, Ex. 20: 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SIN cannot enter the house of a man of God without spreading its contaminating influence around, so that all who dwell beneath its roof are more or less affected by it. David himself, Bathsheba and Uriah were not the only parties affected by David's sin. It was not very long after that his eldest son, Amnon, committed a terrible and unpardonable wrong against his half-sister, Tamar. Absalom, her own brother, avenged this by a sin of equal gravity; he caused his brother, Amnon, to be murdered. It was a terrible repetition of David's own sins, aggravated by the deep shame and mortification that the guilty parties were his own children, and that these abominable deeds of darkness were perpetrated in his own family, he whom God had called as a man after his own heart to reign over his people in Israel. The sins of the father were indeed visited upon the children, whom David saw coming into the inheritance of the nature which he had discovered as shapen in iniquity and conceived in sin. Terribly crushing as is the discovery of sin in ourselves, there is perhaps a still deeper shame, a more poignant anguish, when we discover the repetition and exaggeration of it in our children, and when it has to be graven upon our hearts that in our children's flesh, just as in our own, "dwelleth no good thing." Sin in the head of a household touches not only the children, but the servant, and the visitors. The head or heads of a house give a tone to their house, whatever they are; the most of the household take after them, except in exceptional cases. But as evil is contagious, and as lasting good can only come by direct contact with God, evil like a rank weed, spreads rapidly, while good—eternal good—works more slowly.

David was an Old Testament man, and he had not learned to die to his affections; so that at all times love to God through an indwelling Spirit should be the strongest principle which actuated him. He did not inquire of the Lord about his treatment of his son. Joab knew David's weak side and made use of a wise woman of Tekoah, who came to the king with the story of a son who was a manslayer that she might argue with the king the justice of bringing to Jerusalem the banished Absalom. The father's heart yearned to have his son within hearing distance and Absalom, more and more a slave to the emotions of his heart, who had taken possession of him, far from being melted and won by his father's love conceived the wicked design of seizing the throne. All unknown to his unsuspecting father, who had only imagined that gratitude would bind his son to his interests. "Absalom prepared chariots, and horses, and fifty men to run before him." He thus made a show wherever he went and was a well-known personage; it was a first step in his wicked designs. But he went farther, his conspiracy was deeply laid. He rose early, and stood beside the gate, intercepting all who came to the king for judgment. Then he would inquire into the cause of each one, make himself master of the case, and then malign his father. He would say I have investigated your matter, you have the right on your side, but I cannot hold out any hope of justice; things are sadly mismanaged at court; "there is no man deputed of the king to hear thee." Oh, that I were made judge in the land, that every man which hath any suit or cause might come unto me, and I would do him justice!" And not only did he thus un-then will I serve the Lord" (II. Sam. 15: 7, 8). "Go in peace," was the king's answer. Had David no misgiving that all was not well? When a man is living near to God, and in line with his will in all things, God does not let him be deceived without giving him a certain uneasiness about things about which he needs to be on his guard. But just as far as we act from ourselves, and fail to be wholly dependent upon the Lord, and guided by him, we may be left without such warnings. Did David indulge a hope that Absalom at last shewed signs of drawing near to God? Was he deceived? Oh, how we need God to come between us and our dearest ones, even more than between us and our known enemies!

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AB SALOM'S is a sad story, disgraceful to the young man and full of sorrow for the father. Incidentally, it casts a light on the evils of polygamy. David had taken the course common among Oriental monarchs at the time, in multiplying the number of his wives. We might infer from the silence of the sacred historian on the subject, that God did not disapprove of it. He was apparently acting as he does in many other matters—leaving the evil to bear its own fruit. He did not advantage. Absalom probably expected that as his father was becoming infirm, would be associated with him in the government, as Solomon was afterwards. David must have seen that to place any responsibility in the hands of Absalom would be to invite disaster. With all affection for the young man, he was blind to his faults. Absalom resolves to force his father's hand, and if he will retire of his own accord and make room for him, to force him out. The crafty way in which he ingratiated himself with people is fully described in the lesson.

When the people were, as he judged, ripe for revolt, he went to Hebron, an ancient capital, which was far enough from Jerusalem to be beyond David's observation, and near enough to be within reach when the revolution was organized. The news came on David like a thunder-clap. He was utterly unprepared for his own son, his favorite son, a rebel. Then whom could he trust? The brave king was panic-stricken, and sought safety in flight. With his wives and children and a few friends he hastily quit his palace and hurried out of the city across the Kedron and up the Mount Olives and thence to the Jordan, proposing to seek a refuge on the east of the river among the tribes who had benefited most by his campaigns.

After forty years Absalom said. "I history shows that this should be for not forty years. The entire length of David's reign over all Israel was only thirty three years. It is impossible, therefore, that the word for forty in the passage should be correct. Absalom's plea for his absence was that when he was a fugitive from just he had made a vow to offer a sacrifice at Hebron, his birthplace, if ever he was permitted to return. This may have been true or false, but it served its purpose of deceiving the king. The making of vows was a common practice in the East. A story told of Mohammed administering a proof for a vow. It is said that a woman rode into Jerusalem in the presence of a camel and told him that she had been attacked by robbers. She made a vow that if she should escape, she would offer the camel in sacrifice. Mohammed told her she must not keep her vow. "What he asked," wouldst thou kill the animal whose speed thou owest thy life? G wicked woman, and care for the beast. It is mine since thou didst vow it to me sacrifice and not thine. I give it to thee and bid thee treat it kindly."

Oh, that I were made judge. Many kings since David's time have had trouble through the impatience of their son. Henry II., of England, with all his troubles from his enemies in France and Scotland, bore a brave, undaunted spirit, but he broke down when his sons rebelled against him. The last years of his life were embittered by their constantly recurring plots and at the last he sank beneath the discovery of ingratitude. When he undertook to pardon all who had plotted against him, and asked that a list might be furnished him of those who desired to take advantage of this amnesty he saw at the head the name of John, his favorite son, whom he had never suspected of disloyalty. When he saw that name he received a shock from which he never recovered. He fell sick, lingered a few days during which his mental distress was acute and died, the doctors said, rather of a broken heart, than of any disease.

The people increased continually with Absalom. It is strange that they should have done so. They might logically have reasoned that no young man could be trusted who would deceive his own father, and try to depose him. It is safe to conclude that a man who betrays another, will break his promises in other cases if his interests lie that way.

dermine the confidence of the people in his father, but also he changed the due etiquette which belongs to a court; and "when any man came nigh to him to do him obeisance, he put forth his hand, and took him, and kissed him." The people were unused to this familiarity; naturally they drew invidious comparisons between the stately old king, and his handsome, gracious, fascinating son. "And on this manner did Absalom to all Israel that came to the king for judgment. So Absalom of the men of Israel," but hearts fully yielded to God are not so easily stolen. Thus evil was brewing out of David's own house, and he had no thought, no suspicion of what was going on. He was not aware how much his own weakness with his children had borne evil fruit. And it came to pass after forty years (some MSS. say four years, which is probably correct), Absalom came to the king with the petition that he might pay a vow which he had made during his residence in Geshur. Under his handsome exterior, an awful development of evil had been in progress: lying, deceit, and other foul sins had been added to the sin of murder. And now the basest hypocrisy took a prominent place in the dark deeds of this unrepentant sinner. "I pray thee," he said to his father, "let me go and pay my vow, which I have vowed to the Lord in Hebron. For thy servant vowed a vow while I abode at Geshur in Syria, saying, If the Lord shall bring me again to Jerusalem, forbid David increasing his household, he let him have his own way and learn by experience that it was a way that brings sorrow. God still governs the world much in the same way. He tells us in his Word what is the right way, but if we choose the wrong, he does not prevent us. Afterwards we learn in sorrow and shame that it would have been better for us if we had taken God's way. It is as if a child insisted on touching a hot stove in spite of its mother's caution. The child's pain is not a punishment inflicted by the mother for disobedience, but the natural and inevitable result of its acts. David's foreign wives, each apparently with her own establishment, brought up her children in her own way. Amnon grew up with sensual propensities which he was not trained to restrain. Absalom grew up vain, ambitious, vindictive, untruthful, and utterly godless. All the elements for a tragedy were present in David's household. It came in Amnon's despicable crime and Absalom's cruel, treacherous vengeance. By the time David was sixty years old his eldest son had been murdered and his second son was a fugitive from justice. After a time, he was permitted to return, but he came back not as a repentant prodigal, but with the bold effrontery of the aristocratic criminal, who knows that his position and his personal charms will protect him from punishment. Many young men are of his mind. The love of an indulgent father never moves them to respect or love in return, but is simply a fact on which they can count and turn to their own

HOPE THE LIFE LINE MISSION.

ABOUT sixteen years ago, Miss T. M. Wadsworth, a lady of intelligence and refinement and a true Christian, felt impelled to do some work for the Master. She decided to leave the home of her early years, and make another for herself in a tenement house in one of the poorest sections of Brooklyn, N. Y., where she might help to lighten the darkened faces about her. For some time her work was limited to small meetings held in her room, and house-to-house visitations; then, serving the crowds that gathered on the docks for their Sunday recreation, she decided to hire a few friends and began to hold open-air services.

The first service was held on July 4, 1880, from the deck of a floating swimming-bath, and for the rest of the summer this place was used, until cold weather compelled her to seek a better shelter. Through the kindness of Mr. Frank H. Marston, who was present at the first meeting, a store was fitted up as a reading-room at 416 Van Brunt street, and there, with little assistance, Miss Wadsworth maintained Gospel Temperance meetings with marked success.

This unique mission, conducted by a self-supporting missionary, aroused the interest of a number of personal friends, who leased and fitted up more commodious quarters at 412 Van Brunt street. At the outset this mission was known as the "Red Hook Reading-room," but in 1892 it was rebaptized and incorporated under the name of "The Life-Line Mission." It is non-sectarian and works as a feeder to the evangelical churches in the neighborhood. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Fraser, thoroughly industrious and good people, who are in charge of the Mission at the present time, are doing excellent work among those who are afloat. Mrs. Fraser goes out among the homes of the poor and the neglected, bearing the message of life and light. No more varied or unique field for Christian work could be found than that on the little peninsula of Red Hook Point, which projects, finger-like, from the south-west side of busy Brooklyn. Mr. Fraser, a Scotchman by birth, is continually going about among the numerous vessels laid up in the Erie and Atlantic basins, where there is a floating population of from 3000 to 5000 souls on the steamers, sailing ships, canal boats, and barges. He is familiarly called "Holy Joe" by the sailors, and he can speak to them fluently in several languages and is well-liked generally. Services are held every day in the week and in the open air as frequently as possible in the summer season. On Sunday afternoon, a dock meeting is held and one of our illustrations shows a group of longshoremen, sailors, women and children at in sin, can speak with the eloquence of personal sympathy direct to the hearts and souls of their auditors. The rooms are always open to those who have been out in the highways and byways or wandering on foreign shores, and many a lost one has there found peace in believing. Numbers of the rescued love to go there to give the testimony of a changed life and to bring others to a knowledge of the Gospel.

In the evenings there is usually a fair attendance at the Reading-room, which, with its circulating library, lighted lamps, and tables strewn with magazines and daily papers, offers an attractive opportunity for an hour's rest and intellectual recreation. Here may be found, sitting quietly side by side, representatives of almost every nation on earth. The library contains New Testaments and Bibles printed in at least seventeen different languages, besides a large variety of books of information and travel.

During the last few years, there have been some remarkable instances of religious awakening among those who have entered the doors of the Life-Line Mission. One of these is a case of a Swedish sailor from a foreign vessel, lying in Erie Basin. Four years ago he was a notorious sinner, and had led a godless life for many years. One night he was strolling along Van Brunt street, and, thinking perhaps that the brightly lighted Mission Hall was a saloon, he stepped in. The evening service was progressing at the time, and he quietly sat down at the far end of the room. Over the speaker's head hung a sign on which was printed the text, "He is able to save to the uttermost." Being able to read and understand English, he was visibly ima whole ship's crew, including officers and captain, to the Saviour. Mr. Marston met them all personally at the time, and was impressed with their sincerity. Several of them gave testimony at one of the meetings.

About six months ago, a meeting was held in the fore-castle of the steamship Bremerhaven, while she was laid up in Erie Basin for repairs. Word of the proposed meeting was sent in advance, and in honor of the occasion the men arranged the compartment with flags, lanterns, and other decorations. An interesting service was held and afterwards the men were invited to attend the Mission rooms. At first they were somewhat shy, but finally several became constant visitors, so that, as a result, eleven were drawn to accept Christ during the few days the vessel was in the basin. Three years ago the vessel River Bann was visited by Mr. Fraser. He was ridiculed and laughed at, while on board, and when he left he felt as though nothing had been accomplished. That night, however, one of the men, on going ashore, on a few hours' leave, was hailed by a companion and requested to bring a fish-line with him on his return, in order that some eels might be caught. The man did not return that night, but in the morning, as he was going up the gang-plank, he was asked for the fish-line which he had forgotten. His reply, given with a radiant smile, was that instead of getting a fish-line, he had found a "Life Line" that had pulled him in at the Mission, where he had spent the night and Whether this came about through the kindly influence and work of Miss Wadsworth, or was a change of heart in the aged owner, will never be known; but it is not at all unlikely that her visits and the Christian sympathy she showed must have helped to bring about the change.

Japan's Great Earthquake.

What is said of it by a Celebrated Seismologist.

PROF. JOHN MILNE, F. R. S., is widely known throughout the scientific world as an authority on earthquakes. He was for a number of years the occupant of the Chair of Seismology at the Japanese Imperial University. Concerning the recent earthquake at Kamaishi and neighborhood, in which thirty thousand persons are said to have perished, Prof. Milne says: "At Kamaishi the origin of the disturbance was probably close to the coast, and therefore the waves rushed in with great violence. The cause may have been either a submarine eruption or a gigantic landslip at the bottom of the ocean. Strange to say, for many years past the origin of the large earthquakes which have been felt on the eastern coast of Japan has been traced to a point perhaps a hundred miles out at sea, and such a line lies, to use a technical expression, in the anti-clinal folding which forms the backbone of the northern island. It is quite possible that this folding is still in progress, and from time to time the crumbling crust reaches the limits of elasticity and suddenly breaks. That is the reason for probably ninety-five per cent. of these disturbances. In Japan there are about a hundred volcanoes that have been active during the historical period. Fujiyama, the sacred mountain, is said to have been formed about 200 A.D., when it marched from the south to its present position, leaving the depression behind which is now known as Lake Biwa. There is this to be said for earthquakes, that though they do an enormous amount of damage—five hundred lives and several million dollars is probably their annual cost in Japan—they ought to be a source of satisfaction to the survivors, for a shock is simply an announcement that the crust of the earth is buckling upwards and that the country is growing."

The benefits that have been derived from the study of Seismology in Japan are manifold. The method of building bridges and houses have been revolutionized. For example, the piers of bridges are now made thicker at their bases and taper upwards, instead of being built with straight sides as in Europe, and brick factory chimneys have been replaced by structures of sheet iron. A severe earthquake now would not cause a fourth of the damage which would have been inevitable on such visitations as the recent one, had it occurred even half-a-dozen years ago."

Mr. Milne proposes that fifteen or twenty stations should be established round the globe, so that by recording earthquake movements the effective rigidity of the earth may be ascertained. This knowledge would be of enormous value to physicists and astronomers all over the scientific world.

pressed with the earnest words of the leader and those who spoke with him. That night he gave himself to Christ. After the meeting he was spoken to by one of the conductors of the Mission, and encouraged to stand fast, and he promised faithfully to do so. Next day he brought in a mate from his ship, who also gave his allegiance to the Captain of Salvation. A few days afterwards the vessel sailed for China, and for four years nothing was heard of him. Finally, the vessel again touched at this port. The converted sailor again sought the Mission, bringing with him fourteen mates, who through him had been converted one by one during the four years' trip!

Last winter another case occurred where a seaman, who, through the instrumentality of the Mission, had become a Christian, was the means of bringing nearly had been saved. Several other men of the same crew have since found that Life Line and are holding on to it still. Among them are several who mocked and ridiculed "Holy Joe," in the most profane manner on his first trip aboard.

Several years ago an old lady owned the property where the present Mission is located. She became very sick and Miss Wadsworth visited her frequently. On one of these visits the missionary made a remark that the place would be an admirable site for a mission. The old lady was not in sympathy with missions nor any kind of Christian work, and flew into a violent rage, saying that she had rather see the building "burn down than be used as a mission." Some time afterward the old lady died, and the executors of her will sought out Mr. Marston and offered the present premises to him for the Mission.

Linda Harman's Dilemma.

IF you are to do those people any good, Linda," said Miss Mackenzie, standing with her back to the door, and holding her parasol firmly in her hand, now and then brandishing it as an emphatic gesticulation showed how much she was in earnest, "you must go and live among them. This luxury, this garden, these rugs and couches and easy chairs are not for you. The Lord's servant must endure hardness. You cannot be a sybarite, Linda, and save souls. And the souls in Dearborn Court are crying out that no man cares for them. They are sinking to perdition, with none to lift a hand. Linda, take care how you disregard the Lord's call."

"I am sure, Cousin Harriet, all I want is to see my way clearly," answered Linda with spirit. "I do not care for state and splendor. The beautiful things in my home reproach me when I think of the poverty in the world. But I am not responsible for the furnishing of this mansion. Father and mother and brother Dick have done this, and my little room, as you know, is as plain as an anchorite's cell. I love those poor girls at the Court, and I long to work for them and live among them. But am I to disobey my own father, and leave my mother who needs me, that I may preach and teach the keeping of the Ten Commandments, in lanes and alleys, where there are no homes like mine? I must see my way first, Cousin Harriet."

"He that loveth father and mother more than me, is not worthy of me," repeated the elder lady solemnly. "Linda, how will you answer him in the judgment day, when he asks you why you scorned his little ones, and chose the primrose path?"

There came an interruption. A low and discreet knock, as of one who forebore to break upon a conversation, but acted under orders, made itself heard. "Come in," said Linda, and Jane entered. Jane, her mother's maid, black-gowned, white-capped, and pale-faced. A girl who looked tired to death, but steadfast not the less. Jane, though only an obscure maid servant, was a person of strong sense and real character, and while she adored Miss Linda, she disapproved of Miss Mackenzie, whose philanthropic movements so far as they had to do with Linda Harman, were equally frowned on by every one in the household, from the Judge himself to the small boy in buttons, who attended the door.

"Your mother, Miss Linda, is took with one of her spells, and wants you as soon as you can come please," said Jane. Mrs. Harman's spells were not to be disregarded, and Miss Mackenzie took her leave.

Nobody who had met Linda, as three hours later, wan, white, and weary, she emerged from her mother's chamber of pain, would have fancied that the young girl trod a primrose path. In fact, there were days when the mother's life seemed to hang on a slender thread, and the least excitement, the least over-exertion might precipitate its breaking. Then there would be periods of comparative comfort, and the lady would be marvelously well, and undertake her usual tasks, and see the friends she dearly loved but always there was for her family the danger in the background. Linda's mother's health was in this manner a catastrophe.

Linda, whose piety was as single-hearted as a child's, and whose charm was that of a sweet flower, a lily or a rose not lovelier, had developed great power over other girls. She had the rare gift of conciliating the rudest, and in the Working-Girls' Club, to which her mother had introduced much of her endeavors, nobody sang or talked, or pleased the members, as she did. Many a girl, toiling in the stifling atmosphere of a factory, was strengthened and aided through the week, by what her friend, Miss Harman, had said in the social evening at the Club.

Latterly Miss Mackenzie and others had been desirous that a girl like Linda, rich and beautiful, and highly accomplished, should take up missionary work among such girls as those who came to the Club, living at the settlement near them, and devoting her whole life, instead of a part to their service.

Linda's mother, however, while not saying or even looking anything in opposition, felt that she had a claim on her daughter.

As Linda bent over her, fanning her softly, when the spasm of acute anguish passed off, on this afternoon of Miss DINING UNDER THE BIG TENT AT THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

Mackenzie's call, Mrs. Harman whispered: "I—can't—be—a stumbling stone, dear, but wait—till God takes—your mother."

There are girls among those who read this story, able to comprehend Linda's dilemma. To such my word is, "Duties are never in antagonism." A girl should weigh the matter well, however, before she chooses between a plainly manifest need of her, in her own household, and a probably excellent opening for her in another field.

I am glad that Linda wrought out her problem over her Bible and in her closet. Next day she wrote to her cousin, "All that I can do, plus the work in my own home, I will do, but I cannot abandon my own dear mother, nor trust my home vineyard to other hands than mine. I am sure that my place is here."

A few days ago, I saw a happy throng of girls in Linda's drawing-room. They had a half-holiday, and Linda invited them to be her guests, and gave them a delightful entertainment. The lively home was lovely for these girls to enjoy. The bric-a-brac, the books, the pictures, the rugs, the music enhanced their pleasure. And I thought it was as well perhaps that they should come to Linda as that Linda should go to them. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Maronite City of Lebanon, Syria.

During the troublous days of 1860, when all Lebanon was in gloom over the massacre and pillage by the Druses, the Maronite city of Deir-el-Kamar, on South Lebanon, was the heaviest sufferer. This is one of the largest Maronite cities in the mountain district, and is the chief town of the settlement of the same name. It was estimated that 1800 Maronites were slain by the Turks and Druses, who united forces for the attack against the ancient enemy of the Druses. At the present time, Deir-el-Kamar has a population of about 2700, of whom 2340 are Maronites, and less than a hundred Druses. A good work is being done among the people through the American Mission at Beyrout. The Maronites are of war-like disposition, and every male inhabitant of a Maronite village does military service. Ignorant and superstitious, the monks practically control the entire Maronite population. This famous Maronite city is shown in the photograph on the opposite page.

Many Friends in Different States, Interested in our Little Guests at Mont-Lawn.

EVERY year widens the circle of those good friends who take a lively personal interest in the little tenement boys and girls at our Children's Home. Many letters are received from contributors to the work, in which the writers ask to be told more particularly about the children for whom they are providing the means for an enjoyable outing. These are an-page, found our little guests enjoying the dinner in the big tent. It is a bright, sunny day, and you notice Caroline has shade her eyes with her hands, as she turns about from her tempting dinner to see what the artist is going to do. The little miss is a very sweet singer—it brings the tears to one's eyes to hear her sing "Only Me." Talent is by no means lacking among these children from the slum. A number have natural musical or elocutionary ability that might well be envied by those better able to cultivate such talents. Little Isabelle, a bright-faced girl with light hair, recites "The Blind Beggar" beautifully. Isabelle is such a delightful little girl, always asking for a care-taker, "What can I do to help you? There are a number of helpful boys, too. Bruno" and Alfred, the two stand together in the rear of the tent, volent to make their own beds, and are quite careful as any girl to remove each wrinkle from the pillow-slip and to adjust the white spread "just so."

When the children finish their dinner at the first sound of the gong there "order;" next they rise, and then they march in two stately divisions, the girls around one side of the Home and the boys about the other, meeting in front of the verandah. Here, at one tap of the gong they face about, and, at the second signal they scatter, each running at double speed to secure, if possible, one of the "scups," as our children call the swings.

August finds the Home filled to its most capacity. From dawn till dark it is a scene of activity, for the care of so many children is no light task. The Matron and her staff. There are so many different temperaments to be studied, so many little hands and feet to be kept out of mischief and danger, so many little heads to be led to learn and to love Jesus. The material needs of the Home alone are enough to keep the caretakers busy, but nothing is neglected. A not until the last frowzy lit head is safely pillowed for the night and the last little voice hushed in slumber, can the work of the day be said to have ended.

"Constant Reader," Sharon Springs, N.Y. 1. If no drunkard can enter the kingdom of heaven, what will become of the drunkard-maker? 2. Is it right for a Christian to grow or deal in hops? 3. Is it right for Christians to run their milk factories to the creamery on Sunday?

The condemnation of the maker of drinks is repeatedly pronounced in the Scriptures. (See Habakkuk 2:15; Gal. 5:21; Matt. 24:49, 51; Rom. 14:21, etc.) 2. Not if there are to be utilized in the production of intoxicating drink. There are, however, other uses to which they can legitimately be put. 3. If be an absolute work of necessity, and if in other way the cream can be saved from spoiling, then it would be justified. But even in works of necessity, the actual labor should be reduced to a minimum.

"Little Prairie, Wis. Why was David anointed three times? Why did not the first anointing by Samuel cover his kingly office?

The first anointing was a private ceremony. It had been widely known Saul would undoubtedly have killed David. Afterwards the ceremony was performed before all the people as ratification of the first ceremony.

S. W. Roseboom, N. Y. 1. What are the seven wonders of the world? 2. Does the Bible really teach that Christ will rule in person as King on this earth, or is it an idea without foundation? 3. Can a person be secretly converted without the world knowing it at the time?

They are the Hanging Gardens of Babylon, the Pyramids of Egypt, the Colossus of Rhodes, the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, the Statue of Jupiter Olympus, the Mausoleum of Artemisia, and the Phos of Alexandria. 2. The Scriptures plainly teach that Christ will rule on the earth. The statements made, and are, spiritualized by some commentators, but the meaning on the surface is clearly that of a personal rule on the earth. See Rev. 20:4-6; 5:10; Matt. 19:28, and many passages in the Old Testament, which have not yet been fulfilled and never will be until Christ reigns on the earth. 3. Yes; but it will not remain so. It is both a duty and a pleasure for a Christian to show his allegiance and confess Christ before men.

M. J. S. Blooming Valley, Pa. 1. Has the gospel been preached to every nation under the sun? 2. Was Uzzah, the man who touched the Ark, and was struck dead, a sinner? If so, how do you prove it?

Tibet, Central China, parts of Central Africa, some of the desert tribes, and parts of Arabia are still without the Gospel. 2. Uzzah was one of the sons of Abinadab in whose house at Kirjath-jearim the Ark rested many years. Josephus (see Antiquities, ch. 6) states distinctly that Uzzah was of a Levitical family. It was because Abinadab, his father, was a Levite, that the Ark was taken into his house. Some commentators hold that Amminadab (spoken of in 1 Chron. 15:10) was identical with Abinadab.

M. W. San Diego, Cal. If the evil of rum selling is largely upon Christianity, is he responsible for it? Will the Christian churches be held responsible for so great a curse upon our people? Have not the Christian churches already been drawn into the cesspool by the money power of rum in politics? Is there more than the one positive cure for drunkenness, which is, prohibiting the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and to do this will it not be necessary to amend the Constitution in regard to the manufacture of alcohol, and all distilled liquors?

These matters, and all others relating to the responsibilities of Christian citizens and churches in connection with the liquor traffic, are ably and exhaustively treated in ex-United States Senator Blair's famous pamphlet, "The Temperance Reform," which can be procured of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at five cents per copy, or in quantities at $3. per hundred.

M. F. Reading, Penn. I often see allusions to persons and stories, such as that some enterprise is like the labor of Sisypheus. I suppose that is sufficient for a college-bred man, but I do not know who Sisypheus was and what he did. Is there no book that would help me to such knowledge easily and quickly?

If you have the WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA on your book-shelves, you can turn to it and get the information you need under its initial letter, without any loss of time.

J. Cassell, Crown King, Ariz. I have heard it claimed that the late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon publicly claimed that he smoked to the glory of God. Is it true?

We believe Mr. Spurgeon made the statement, but afterward expressed his regret that he did so, as it had been deemed irreverent. The facts were that an American minister, making an address in Mr. Spurgeon's church, denounced smoking, and declared that any Christian indulging in the habit was living in sin. Mr. Spurgeon, who was present, and was known to be a habitual smoker, could not be silent, as silence would be a tacit admission of guilt. He made a speech in which he referred to his known ailment of chronic rheumatism. He said, "When I found intense pain relieved, a weary brain soothed and calm, refreshing sleep obtained by a cigar, I have felt grateful to God, and have blessed his name. This is what I meant, and by no means did I use sacred words triflingly."

J. M. B. Halifax, N. S. As the Bible does not say Blessed is the converted man, but Blessed are the meek, etc., and always gives character and growth and conduct as the condition of blessedness, can a man logically say: "I am a Christian because I was converted at such and such a time and place?"

The man who is leading a new life may logically refer to the time and place where he ceased to live for himself and the world and turned to God, if he can remember them, as he often can. There are many cases in which the change has been so gradual that he cannot fix on the time and place of the change; and conversions of this kind are often more reliable than sudden ones, which may be under excitement, and so be evanescent. If a wicked man forsakes his sins and determines, henceforth in Christ's strength to live for God, and he is enabled to keep his resolution, he is not likely to forget the time that he made it. But if he has had a religious training and has not been guilty of gross sins and becomes more and more under Christ's power and love, he may not remember a change save as a very gradual accession of light and strength.

Wesley Dixon, Tarrytown, N. Y. Was there ever such a tale of woe as that which causes people to stand aghast, namely, that of Armenia? How grandly has this land of freedom responded to the call for aid from "over the sea." Yet, as all the reports show that matters are no better, that slaughter is still going on, and that even the plan to have them leave the country has failed, a new plan must be adopted, or the whole race will be exterminated. The nations are unwilling to join together and wipe out the accursed Turkish nation "which should be done." What then shall be done, in order to break the chains of these worse than slaves? I answer, the same thing which was advocated so earnestly before the outbreak of our rebellion, namely, to buy their freedom.

Let it be inquired of the Turkish Government, the price it will take to allow them to leave their blighted land and come to this God-given country. When the price is named, let the amount be raised, not only by this land but others. Let us build an ark of money and bring them from their ruined homes.

What a chance for the wealthy to do a grand act, give of their means, which the God of heaven and earth has placed in their keeping to accomplish good.

Our correspondent's suggestion is a striking one, bold enough to attract attention. It is doubtful, however, whether the Sultan would consent to liberate the Armenians under any circumstances. They are the workers, the producers of the country, and without them, vilely as they are used, the country would suffer material loss, and the Turks are fully aware of the fact.

J. B. Simpson, Atlanta, Ga. Will you consider it as sending in ten new subscribers for THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA if I should make a present of a year's subscription to each of ten of my Sunday School teachers (who do not now take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), and in that way secure for myself a complete set of THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA?

Certainly, you are quite at liberty to do so. It would be a most appropriate present to give each of your teachers THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year, and in doing this, and taking the Encyclopedia for your own personal use, you will be reaping a two-fold advantage—securing a valuable work of information and reference for yourself, and doing good to others.

J. W. P., Holman's Mills, N. C. Where can I get the best cheap book, giving a history and full explanation of our monetary system?

In the "History of the United States Mint, and of American Coinage," published by Geo. G. Evans, Philadelphia, you will find the whole subject exhaustively treated.

D. Huntington. Is it right to carry a person into church after death, who in life would never go, and to use the same ritual that is used for the Christian dead?

By common consent and usage, the rite of Christian burial is charitably extended to many who in life work of necessity, it would be justifiable. The usual plan for those who wish to avoid traveling on Sundays is to make the journey on Saturday, returning Monday, but this would probably be impracticable in the case you mention.

Subscriber, Farmington. Who was Josephus? Some say he was a heathen writer; others that he was of Jewish descent. I have been taught from youth that he was a heathen?

He was a Jew and the descendant of a royal Jewish house. In early manhood he became a religious devotee, and, when about twenty years old, he joined the Pharisees. In his autobiography he gives his own genealogy, which leaves no room to doubt the purity of his Jewish descent.

M. A. C., Pella, Ia. 1. Should the Lord's Prayer be repeated in concert in a public place? 2. Was it given to mature individuals or children? 3. Was it given to converted or unconverted men, women or children? 4. Can you advise me as to where I can get a symbolical dictionary?

1. Yes. It is a very beautiful and appropriate part of the service. 2. To men, women, and children alike, since it expresses the spiritual and material needs of all ages and classes. 3. To believers, certainly; unbelievers can have no share in its petitions. 4. Inquire of some leading publishing house.

R. E. Mann, Albany, N. Y. In all the exploration of Egypt has there been no record found of the plagues or of the Red Sea disaster?

Nothing has been found as yet referring to either, so far as we have seen. Prof. Flinders Petrie has found a reference recently to a war with Israel, apparently after they were established in Palestine; and he thinks he is on the track of other references to Israel. It is doubtful, however, whether he will find any on the two subjects you mention. The monuments are occupied with triumphs and successes. Neither Egypt nor any other nation would be apt to make an imperishable record of disaster.

De Witt A. Berry, Cedarville, Mo. Is there any really valid reason for believing that the days of creation were more than twenty-four hours long?

The condition of the strata of the earth's crust is the reason for believing that between the time of the earth's coming into existence and the appearance of man there stretches a vast period of time. It is evident that there were a number of stages each with its appropriate plants and animals. That they were successive is proved by the fact that in all parts of the world they are found in the same order. The stratum that is found above another in one part of the world, is never found below it anywhere else. Fossil plants and animals are found in these strata in various stages of development, indicating that each stage occupied immense periods. The story of the earth's cooling and development is told so plainly in the rocks that we are bound to believe it. The Bible is not impaired in value by our regarding the days as periods. As Peter said, "a thousand years are with the Lord as one day." (II. Peter 3:8.)

M. B., Manville, Wyo. Will the ten tribes be restored to Palestine with the Jews? If not, what is the significance of their history being in the Bible?

From Zechariah 10:6, and many other passages in his prophecy and in Hosea and from Paul's statement that all Israel shall be saved, (Romans 11:26), and from the sealing of the thousands of the tribes in Revelation 7, we conclude that the ten tribes will be restored. There is, as yet, some doubt as to their identity. Many students hold that the Anglo-Saxon race is the ten tribes, but this theory is stoutly denied by other students. The significance of their history consists among other things in the fact of God being unchangeable. As he governed Israel, so he governs other nations in modern times.

Subscriber, Hollidansburg, Pa. Our town is eight miles from another town connected by a trolley road. Our pastor exchanges pulpits with one of the other towns and uses the electric cars on Sunday to go out and in. Do they break the Sabbath? I hold that no Christian should use the cars on Sunday for any purpose whatever.

The distance seems to be too long to walk conveniently, and unless there are other and better means of conveyance at hand, it would seem to be necessary to use the trolley in such case. Thus, if it could be regarded as a

Children of the Street.

THERE is only one thing I have against the Sabbath Schools of this country, and that is, they are too respectable. We gather into our schools the children of the refined, and the cultured, and the educated; but, alas! for the great multitude of the children of the abandoned and lost! A few of them are gathered into our Sabbath Schools; but what about the seventy thousand destitute children of New York, and a score of thousands of destitute children of Brooklyn, around whom are thrown no benign, no heavenly, and Christian influences?

It is a tremendous question, what is to become of the destitute children of these cities? We must either act on them, or they will act on us. We will either Christianize them or they will heathenize us. It is a question not more for the Christian than for the philanthropist and the statesman. O! if we could have all these suffering little ones gathered together, what a scene of hunger, and wretchedness, and rags, and sin, and trouble, and darkness! If we could see those little feet on the broad road to death, which through Christian charity ought to be pressing the narrow path of life; if we could hear those voices of blasphemy, which ought to be singing the praises of God; if we could see those little hearts, which at that age ought not to be soiled with one unclean thought, becoming the sewers for every abomination; if we could see those suffering little ones sacrificed on the altar for every iniquitous passion, and baptized with fire from the lava of the pit—we would recoil, crying out, "Avaunt thou dream of hell!" They are not always going to be children. They are coming up to be men and women of this country. That spark of iniquity that might now be put out with one drop of the Water of Life, will become the conflagration of every green thing that God ever planted in the soul. That which ought to have been a temple of the Holy Ghost will become a scarred and blasted ruin—every light quenched and every altar in the dust. That petty thief, who slips into your store and takes a yard of cloth from your counter, will become the highwayman of the forest, or the burglar at midnight, picking the lock of your money-safe and blowing up your store to hide the villainy. A great army, with staggering step, and bloodshot eye, and drunken hoot, they are coming on—gathering recruits from every grog-shop and den of infamy in the land, to take the ballot-box and hurrah at the elections. The hard-knuckled fist of ruffianism will have more power than the gentle hand of intelligence and sobriety. Men, bloated, and with the signature of sin burned in from the top of the forehead to the bottom of the chin, will look honest men out of countenance. Moral corpses, which ought to be buried a hundred feet deep to keep them from poisoning the air, will rot in the face of the sun at noonday. Industry, in her plain frock, will be unappreciated, while thousands of men will wander around in idleness, with their hands on their hips, saying: "The world owes us a living." O! what a tremendous power there is in iniquity when uneducated, and unrestrained it gathers full force, drowning like surges, crushing like rocks. By the Gospelization of the rising generation let us save this land for civilization and Christianity.

Extravagance.

YOU have no right to ride in a carriage when you owe the wheelwright who furnished the landau, and the horse-dealer who provided the blooded span, and the harness-maker who caparisoned the gay steeds, and the liveryman who furnished the stabling, and the driver who sits with rosetted-hat on your coach-box. I am glad to see you ride. The finer your horses and the better your carriage, the better it pleases me. But if you are in debt for the equipage, and hopelessly in debt, get down and walk like the rest of us! It is well to understand that it is not the absolute necessities that we find it so hard to meet, but the fictitious wants. God promises us shelter, but not a palace; and raiment, but not chinchilla; and food, but not canvas-back duck. As long as we have enough to meet the positive necessities of life, we ought to be content until we can afford the superfluities. As soon as you see a man deliberately consent that his outgo shall exceed his income, you may know he has started on the broad road to bankruptcy and moral ruin. The young man who came from the oil wells in Pennsylvania, having gained a sudden fortune of two million of dollars, and then ran through the whole of it in less than two years, illustrated on a large scale what some are doing on a small scale.

This wholesale extravagance accounts for a great deal of depression in national finances. Aggregates are made up of units, and so long as one-half of the people of this country are in debt to the other half, you cannot have a healthy financial condition. The national resources are drawn off, not only for useless extravagances, but for those that are positively pernicious. The theatres of New York cost that city every year two millions of dollars. We spend in this country ninety-five millions of dollars every year for cigars and tobacco. In the United States we expend annually one thousand four hundred and eighty-three millions of dollars for rum. Now, take those facts, and is it strange that our national finances are crazied? If you have an exportation of bread-stuffs four times what you have now, and an importation of gold four times what you have now, there would be no permanent prosperity in this country until people quit their sinful lavishness, and learn honest economy.

From the Country.

THE young man comes from the country with industrious habits. His father worked; his mother worked; his brothers worked. He knows no better, and continues industrious for awhile. But he soon finds out that there are a great many around him who get along better than he without any work. They dress better. They drink the best wines. They have a good seat at the theatre. They have money to bet on the election, on horses, on the contest between the Athletics and Athletics. The young man wonders where these idlers get their money. Four ways of getting money: by inheritance, by earning it, by begging it, by stealing it. Some of these shining ones get it not by inheritance, nor by earning it, nor by begging.

The young man, in a fit of indignation throws up his work, and consorts with these idlers, and has soon learned the same tricks, and dies and is not as much mourned over as the fast horse they foundered and killed by a too hasty watering. When a young man earns a thousand dollars and spends fifteen hundred, he goes overboard. If he earns fifteen hundred and spends two thousand, he goes overboard. The thing is inevitable.

A man resolves to be honest, but here are fifty Shylocks on the street. They undersell him. They twist about so as to escape the penalty of the law, caring nothing for God, but a little anxious about the Sheriff. The young man says, "This is galling rivalry. Perhaps I had better give up my old-fogy notions about honesty. This transaction may be a little doubtful, but then they all do it." This temptation is augmented by the fact that professors of religion do not always stand up straight. It is an awful thing to be a member of a church, and yet by swindling operations prove you are a hypocrite. Such a man will not dare to knock at last at the gate of heaven, and in apology for his business misdemeanors say, "Oh! you ought to have heard me sing 'Rock of Ages' in the Church on earth."

There seems to be an idea abroad that charity can consecrate ungodly gains, and that if you give half of an unrighteous transaction to God he will forgive you for pocketing the rest. The man virtually says, "Oh, Lord! here are fifty dollars for the missionary cause if you won't say anything about the rest of it!" Ah! the Church of God is not a shop for receiving stolen goods! If you have gotten unrighteous gain, better make return to those from whom you took it, or if from the nature of the case that is impossible, then you had better get your stove red-hot, and then, when the heat is fiercest, throw in the blasted spoil. God does not want it.

Scowling.

DON'T scowl; it spoils faces. Before you know it, your forehead will resemble a small railroad map. There is a grand trunk line from your cowlick to the bridge of your nose, intersected by parallel lines running east and west, with curves arching your eyebrows; and O, how much older you look for it! Scowling is a habit that steals upon us unawares. We frown when the light is too strong and when it is too weak. We tie our brows into a knot when we are thinking, and knit them even more tightly when we cannot think. There is no denying there are plenty of things to scowl about. The baby in the cradle frowns when something fails to suit. "Constitutional scowl," we say. The little toddler who likes sugar on his bread and butter tells his trouble in the same way when you leave the sugar off. "Cross," we say about children, and "worried to death," about the grown folks, and as for ourselves we can't help it. But we must. Its reflex influence makes others unhappy; for face answereth unto face in life as well as in water. It belies our religion. We should possess our soul in such peace that it will reflect itself in such placid countenances. If your forehead is ridged with wrinkles before forty, what will it be at seventy? There is one consoling thought about these marks of time and trouble—the death angel almost always erases them. Even the extremely aged, in death, often wear a smooth and peaceful brow, thus leaving our last memories of them calm and tranquil. But our business is with life. Scowling is a kind of silent scolding. It shows that our souls need sweetening. For pity's sake, let us take a sad iron, or a glad iron, or smoothing tool of some sort and straighten these creases out of our faces before they become indelibly engraved upon our visage.

BRIEF NOTES.

NEVER have we placed a Proposition before our subscribers which met with so enthusiastic a response or commanded such immediate success as that of THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA. It would urge all who intend to take advantage of this remarkable opportunity to lose no time in writing us, as the chance to secure a set will soon be gone, and delay now will cause many regrets hereafter. There are thousands who would be willing to wait for years to acquire such a rich prize as is placed within the reach of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers FREE. Read the full announcement in last week's issue.

Last Week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was 250,000 copies, the weight of which exceeded 60,000 pounds.

The Rhenish Mission in the Island of Sumatra is meeting with great success. In its bishopric are nearly a thousand converts from heathenism.

Rev. John Henry Barrows, D. D., who is now in Germany, expects to arrive in India in the 15th of December and to give three months of missionary addresses there.

Baroness Hirsch has added $20,000 to the munificent gifts of her late husband, for the migration of indigent Jews from Russia to the Argentine Republic and elsewhere.

Mr. Agide Pirazzini, of Italy, After spending two years at the International Y. M. C. A. Training School, Springfield, Mass., has returned to his native country, to take up the general secretaryship of the Association at Rome.

The Congregational and Episcopal Churches of Williamstown, Conn., have made a new departure in holding united open-air services every Sunday evening during the summer. The meetings attract several hundred worshippers.

A Wonderful Service was held in the Luckey State Prison at Eddyville by a large number of delegates at the close of the Kentucky Christian Endeavor Convention. Two hundred prisoners fully expressed a desire to lead Christian lives.

The English Methodists are following the example of the Methodist Episcopal Church in country by seceding from Christian Endeavor. A new society will be called "The Wesley Guild," and is to be "distinctly and exclusively Methodist."

William Warren, a Composer, Commenced suicide in New York on July 29. His wife, who was two years ago and who suffered for years from cruelly played with her dying breath that he would be punished for his misconduct by dying a violent death.

Through the Efforts of the Rescue Workers' connection with Hugh Price Hughes' labors in London, eighty-four girls were saved. One of the "Sisters of the People" says, concerning the girls received into the Home, that not one of them is a good mother living.

The Missionary report of the English Society of Friends shows that the contributions last year were sufficient to meet the current expenses and leave a balance of $4,000 in the hands of the treasurer. With a membership of about 15,000 they have a missionary income of nearly $65,000.

The Crowd at South Beach, Staten Island, N. Y., which thronged the Vaudeville pavilion on weekdays was surprised on Sunday, July 29, to find the pavilion open as on weekdays. It was, however, filled, but instead of seeing a vaudeville performance of song and dance, they listened to a service by the Salvation Army.

The Gratifying Announcement is made by the Washington committee, which carried out its programme for the entertainment of the visitors to the great Christian Endeavor convention, that only a day off every debt incurred in providing for the Convention, but will have a small surplus, and the contributions are all collected.

The Annual Report of the China Inland Mission shows that eleven of its missionaries died during the year. Of these nine died on the field, two during a visit home for recuperation. The deaths were from cholera and two from sunstroke. As the China Inland Mission has six hundred and forty-one missionaries in the field, there is reason for thankfulness that the mortality is so low.

Miss Agnes E. Slack, General Secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., arrived in New York to attend the State Conventions of the Union, will remain to attend the National Convention at Louisville in November. Miss Slack is a Methodist preacher and a most effective speaker. Arrangements for addresses from her may be made through Mrs. L. M. Stevens, vice-president of the W. T. U., Portland, Me.

The prayers of Christian Endeavors over the world are asked for the Lone Star Christian Endeavor Society, recently organized in Canton, Tex. Central America, in the face of the difficulties and discouragements. The little society meets every Tuesday at 10 A. M. The society is organized by Mrs. Fitch, the mother of the Presbyterian missionary, Mrs. W. F. Gates.

Rev. F. Ramseyer, of the Basle Mission Society, who from 1860 to 1874 was in captivity in Khamti, writes: "The Lord has heard the prayer of his children, and he has sent the missionaries all Ashanti open for the Gospel. All the large towns and villages are wide open for us, and we are receiving invitations to settle among the people. God has worked changes in Ashanti which no sanguine friend of Christian missions could have hoped for."

Among the speakers at the conference Women's Christian Associations at Lake Geneva, is Miss A. M. Reynolds, world's secretary of the Y. W. C. A., who has just returned from a tour around the world, in which she has visited the W. C. A.'s and done much to encourage and strengthen their work. Her itinerary included Canada, Tasmania, New Zealand and Australia. She is an American lady, the daughter of the Rev. W. Reynolds, of New Haven, Conn.

The Russian Government is making a tentative experiment in the interest of temperance of peculiar kind. It has taken possession of all the saloons in the Southern Provinces and will conduct them in future under its own supervision. The State monopoly was inaugurated by religious services in the saloons now transferred to the crown. The traffic is to be regulated in order to improve the quality of the drink and to induce moderation in the use of it.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Arctic Hardships.

EUROPEAN journals report the rescue of two survivors of an Arctic expedition, who were found by a Norwegian sailing vessel in the far North. The two men tell a sad story of suffering. It appears that in October of last year our Norwegians sailed in a sealing cutt for Spitzbergen. They succeeded in killing seals, walrus, bears and reindeer, but penetrating too late in the season into the fjords they were frozen in. They lived on board their ship for about a month, subsisting on the game they had killed and economizing their ship's stores with the utmost frugality. As the long day was closing and the long night of several months duration was beginning, they found that their ship was in danger of being crushed by the ice. They, therefore, determined to remove to the land while enough daylight remained to choose a stable site for a hut and to erect it. They constructed their hovel and lived in it until the middle of January when they made an excursion to Cape Thorsden, where they knew that Baron Nordenskjöld had built some houses on one of his expeditions. The journey was made over the ice and it took them fourteen hours. They suffered severely by the way, one man being badly frostbitten in feet and face. He found the houses, but no provisions. It was necessary to return to their hovel for food. The sick man was left behind, while the other three made the journey and returned, each man bearing all the provisions he could carry. They found their comrades much worse, and with little hope of life. The provisions were consumed in about two weeks and it became necessary to make another journey to the hovel for more. The three men reached it safely, but a storm arose which prevented their return, and when it had subsided they found the way back was completely blocked by ice and snow. The captain, also, was ill and unable to travel. They were kept prisoners in the house by the weather for six weeks, and the captain died. The two survivors were too weak to bury him, so they enclosed his body in two barrels and covered it with a sail from the ship. A few days later the ice broke up and the two survivors entered a boat that had been saved from the ship and made their way south as far as Bell's Sound, where, as a storm was coming up, they went ashore and made a tent with their sails for shelter. There they were, half dead with cold and hunger when the crew of the sealing vessel found them and took them home. Never had the two men seen a sight so welcome as the ship manned by their countrymen and bound for their own native land. They needed no urging to go aboard. They did not act as men do who are in danger of perishing eternally, but will not accept the offer of salvation though it is pressed upon them with tears. "Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved; thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive correction; they have refused to return." (Jer. 5:3.)

Snapped Through Loyalty.
A cruel case of swindling is reported from New Haven, Conn. A well known citizen who has considerable property there, was formerly under the care of a convalescent, as he had developed some eccentricities and was thought to be incapable of managing his property. He succeeded, however, in convincing the doctors that he was mentally sound and that the people who wanted him cared for, had no interest in getting him under control. A few weeks ago he disappeared from New Haven after raising a loan of several hundred dollars on the security of one of his houses. He was accompanied by two strangers and went to Canada. Nothing more was heard of him until last week, when a telegram came asking aid from his friends. He says that the strangers with whom he left New Haven introduced themselves to him as messengers from Queen Victoria. They informed him that she desired him to visit her and had prepared a castle for his residence. He was to sail by a vessel then in a Canadian port. As the man has always claimed that he was by birth an English lord, he saw nothing improbable in their story and went with them willingly. When they were over the border they robbed him of all his money, but fifty cents, and left him to make his way home as best he could. He had walked until he was tired out and was obliged to appeal to his friends for help. Men, who are mentally sound, would not so easily have fallen victims to the long feathers on the breast and sides of the bird, there was a yellow greasy patch of powder-down, flakes of which seemed to fill the feathers, and he believes that it is this material that gives the light. Each bird appeared to have three lights, one on the breast and one on each hip, and to have control of them, hiding or exposing them at will. It is thought that as the heron lives on fish, that the light is a provision of nature to attract them, and that when the bird stands in the water at night and lets its lights shine, the fish come toward it and become its prey. Exactly the opposite of this is the light to which Christ compared the Christian's life. That is to shine so that men may be saved:

Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven. (Matt. 5:16.)

A Local Vendetta.

The district of New York City, which is known as Little Italy, on account of the preponderance of Italians living there, was the scene of a disturbance recently. To a reporter, who went to investigate it, the policeman on the post gave a significant account of the methods of the people there. He has been in the district several years and has come to know them well. In this case, there was a quarrel between a boarder and his landlady, which ended in his striking her. She defended herself with a knife and stabbed him in the neck. He went to a hospital and was treated. He made no complaint, but when he was well sought out another boarding-house.

He was not allowed to rest. The woman's husband called him to account for striking her and came near being shot as the boarder fired three times at him with a revolver. He was arrested for doing so and is now in jail awaiting trial. The policeman said that it would be difficult to get the man and his wife to appear against him as they were opposed to his arrest and declared themselves able to take care of themselves. When the man comes out of prison, the policeman says, there is little doubt there will be a tragedy. He and his friends will want to get revenge for his imprisonment, and the boarding-house keeper and his wife consider they have not had satisfaction for the original assault. They do not want any interference from the law, but are determined "to get square" with the man. "If they had been Americans," the policeman said, "they would be eager to have their enemy tried and would give all the assistance they could, but these people want to manage their quarrels by themselves in their own way. They cannot be induced to lodge a complaint against an enemy. They want to kill him." Unfortunately the same disposition is manifested in other matters by all nationalities. Those who are willing to submit their quarrels to the law, want to manage their lives in their own way, instead of following the advice of the Psalmist

Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in him; and he shall bring it to pass. (Psalm 37:5.)

Suffering from Mind-Blindness.

A press dispatch from Philadelphia describes a peculiar case which is puzzling the medical staff of the city hospital. A physician from Lawrence, Kans., who was in the city recently, paid a visit to the hospital to see a friend who is on the staff. As he was going through the hospital, he noticed among the clerks a man whom he thought he knew. Looking at him more closely, he was convinced that he was right, and went to him and greeted him by his name. The clerk did not know him, and said so. Yet the visitor declared that he was positive about the identity, and that the clerk had been a class-mate of his own at college. Inquiries about the man in the hospital elicited the fact that he came there originally as a patient. In March last he went to a policeman on the street and told him that he was lost. He could not remember his name, nor his place of residence, nor any fact of his past history. The policeman took him to the hospital where he was examined. Apart from his utter loss of memory, he was well balanced mentally, and was a man of intelligence and education. He remained five months in the hospital as a clerk and did his work satisfactorily, but no clue to his identity was discovered until the Kansas physician saw and recognized him. A telegram was sent to his parents, who have been in great distress about him since January last, when he left home to go to Washington and was not heard of afterwards. The physicians say that his case is a form of mind-blindness, which is very difficult to cure. That he should be rational and intelligent on all subjects but this one is extraordinary. Christian workers who have to do with souls are familiar with such cases. There are many who are honorable and admirable in all their relations, but are unmindful of their obligations toward God and are unmoved by the love and self sacrifice of Christ on their behalf.

Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved; thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive correction; they have refused to return. (Jer. 5:3.)

Death on the Rail.

Widespread horror and dismay have been produced by the appalling railroad wreck at Atlantic City on July 30. The tracks of the Philadelphia & Reading Road and the West Jersey Railroad cross each other diagonally at that point. Early in the evening a special excursion train from Atlantic City for Bridgeton and Salem, N. J., approached the crossing on the West Jersey Road. The engineer saw a train coming on the Reading track, but as the signals in the tower controlling the crossing were set for him to go ahead, he went forward. The engineer of the Reading train also went on, though according to the evidence thus far disclosed, the signals were against him. His engine struck the car next to the locomotive of the West Jersey train, knocking it off the track, and then running off itself and falling on its side. The car behind it was also overturned, as well as the second one of the other train and the other cars of both trains were telescoped. The overturned cars had rolled into a ditch and the boiler of the wrecked engine burst, scattering scalding water over all. The engineer of the Reading train was killed and his body, with the hand still grasping the air-brake, lay beneath the locomotive. Forty-four dead bodies lay around, some of them mangled almost beyond recognition, and fifty persons more or less severely injured were extricated from the ruin and sent to the hospitals. The inquiry that will be held may show who was to blame for the accident, but so far, it appears to rest on the engineer, who is dead. If, as the signalman and the surviving engineer insist, the signal warned him to stop, it will always be a mystery why he should have gone forward. One would have thought that the fearful consequences of disregarding the warning signal must have been present to his mind. It will be well if all who wonder at the man's recklessness are themselves careful to avoid disaster. There are thousands who hear the warning of God's Word and his servants, yet continue in a course that must end in eternal catastrophe.

the swindlers; but they often carry their incredulity too far, and will not believe the messengers who come to them with an invitation from God himself to enter the mansions prepared for them:

Now are we ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead be ye reconciled to God. (II. Cor. 5:20.)

Light-Carrying Birds.

A sportsman writing to a Philadelphia journal describes a phenomenon which has been suggested but not previously confirmed. It is that the heron, and probably other birds, have the power of emitting light. On a recent shooting excursion he was belated one night near a marsh, through which ran a shallow river. The moon had not risen and the night was intensely dark. He was astonished to see lights at various places on the marsh. He thought at first that they were the ignis fatuus, but as they appeared to be stationary, or to move with precision, he concluded that they belonged to some living creature. Going down into the river, he waded as near to a cluster of the lights as he could and then fired. Instantly the lights were extinguished. He waded to the spot to find out what he had shot, and found a dying heron. Examining it closely after he reached home, he saw that underneath

Our Mexican Neighbors.

The Poor, Ignorant Indian Women of the Country Towns and the Rich, Fantastically Dressed Ladies of Merida—A Contrast.

OUR good neighbors, the Mexicans, are an interesting people, and there is much in their slow-going, old-fashioned, domestic and social life that may be studied with interest. Every Mexican town of any pretensions to consequence has its market-place, and here, on certain days, is to be seen much that is quaint and picturesque. On every market-day, men and women come from the interior to sell some of their country products. In Mexico City, many come long distances, and among them not a few Indians. From the smaller towns of Textacalo, Aixtapa, and other suburbs, the Indian squaws set out early in the morning, laden with vegetables or fruit. Arriving at the market, they take the place allotted to vendors of their class, and then display their merchandise to the best advantage. One of our photographs shows a group of "enchilada" sellers in a street of the capital. These are Mexicans of the poorer class. The "enchilada" is a pancake, compound of maize, onions, mincemeat and pickles, and is a popular favorite. Should the market-woman happen to be a mother, she never thinks of leaving her child at home; but strapping it to her back on a sort of pillow, she takes it with her to market, never reckoning the extra load as a burden. As is usual, especially among the Indians, the wives are the chief workers for the family, bearing cheerfully the burdens and doing the heaviest part of the labor. Indian wives are obedient to the point of servility, and very timid. Notwithstanding their hard lives, they are seldom surly and depressed, but greet strangers with a pleasant smile and a gracious manner that shows them to be amiable in disposition.

Very different, in many respects, from these poor Mexican Indian housewives are the young women shown in our second illustration. They are natives of Yucatan, on the eastern side of the republic of Mexico, and therefore also our very good neighbors. Yucatan is the richest part of the republic, and is steadily growing in importance. Merida, the capital of the province, has a population of 50,000 souls. During the holidays, the ladies wear very costly and exceedingly odd costumes, made of the very finest embroidered linen of unapproachable quality and workmanship. These dresses are usually white and are trimmed profusely with very delicate lace "insertion," the whole being of some such pattern as that shown in the illustration. With the addition of an elegant sash, heavily trimmed with gold beads, and a colored silk cloak, with which they can muffle themselves at will, the Merida ladies regard their toilet as complete. The head-gear consists of an embroidered cap, and the feet are cased in dainty little shoes of white satin. This curious dress is worn by the Yucatan ladies with all the grace and dignity peculiar to Mexican women.

and they are all the better for it if the site be well chosen. One enthusiastic camper, writes: "You are brought near to nature's life when you dwell in tents. The ventilation problem is in the past or future. Ozone and air are at your call. At night the crickets and the katydids sing to you their half solemn, half mournful and yet quaint and entertaining song. The robin and the lark welcome you back to daylight with exquisite notes of beauty. You never mind the rain if your tent has been properly pitched and trenched. One remembers camp life and its incidents for years, and it is a wonder that so many people are content to lounge at fashionable watering-places at great expense when the camp is so much better every way."

Thrifty German Mothers.

"The German mother," writes Mrs. Heintzelman, the wife of a Lutheran missionary, "is known, as a rule, to be a good housekeeper and rather a hard-working woman. She devotes all her time to her home and children, teaching them to sing and pray, to knit and sew, and to obey strictly, telling them stories while she is sewing and mending, and our church is greatly obliged to the mothers in our Women's Society. They help us in every possible way, though our congregations consist of the poorer class of people. We know a great many cases in which the head of a German family of six and seven earns one dollar a day, and is willing to contribute a small share to the monthly Mourning Here and Abroad.

All indications point to material changes in the mourning customs of Europe and America. In Europe, although it is true that some few countries cling to the old forms, there has of late years been a noticeable modification, and the insignia of woe is no longer displayed as prominently as it was. An authority on the subject says: "The inordinate wearing been tabooed for hygienic reasons, physicians having pronounced it unhealthy and productive of a morbid condition of mind. In European countries the length of mourning for each relative is prescribed by etiquette; for instance, a widow must wear crape for a year and a day, a lesser period being imposed for other members of the family. In France the death of even the most distant cousin necessitates the donning of black; the period varies from one week to three months, according to the relationship; so rigid is the mourning code in that country that even the death of a

POLITE EXAGGERATIONS

WE all know what they are, who indulge in them apply exaggerated phraseology to the commonest matters. A thing is "lustrous" or "splendid," as the word comes to the lips, the person is "sensible" or "delightful," a book or picture is "charming," "charismatic," "book or picture," "enchanted." This polysyllabic exaggeration is for the sake of saying something pleasant about much of the relation of the ation prevalent in society in India, which leads to widespread insincerity of character. He says: "The moral atmosphere of India suggests and fosters the vice which we write. The grammatical structure and idiom of the Indian vernacular often seems to be the natural outcome of habit of exaggeration. Politeness requires us to practice forms of speech which are as untrue as truth that which we know to be untrue, and as real that which is very far from reality. In speaking to a man of his own house, politeness requires us to call it a palace, although he and we know it is but an ordinary dwelling. If we speak to a man of anything for us we must flatter him to cause it to be done; politely saying, which we know is not the case, that he is too exalted a personage to do anything with his own hands. The dowry of brides is written down in thousands of rupees when tens only are meant. In regard to many topics exaggerations are so common that the rule that the man who sticks to facts conveys a false impression, because discount is always made for lying. A mission catechist was once charged with lying because he had told his friends his salary was thirty rupees, whereas it was only twenty. His defence was that if he had said twenty his friends would have supposed he was really getting ten or fifteen. He had to lie to speak the truth."

Polite exaggeration is a growing evil. Parents and teachers should employ this influence at every opportunity to discourage it and to foster in their children a love of absolute truthfulness in conversation on little things as well as great.

Family Privacy.

There are some families whose attitude toward their neighbors is that of respect and even cordial friendship, yet keep such matters as are distinctly of a family and private nature in the background. On the other hand, there are families—everybody knows some of this class—who not scruple to tell their neighbors the minutest details of their innermost domestic life. This is a serious mistake. The growth of a distinct and homogeneous family is not possible without a certain isolation from all foreign and extraneous influences. We do not mean to say that families ought to wall themselves off from one another and attempt the policy of maintaining independent existence. Any effort to cure an impenetrable seclusion would course be futile. But we do mean that every family ought to be able to throw around itself such a shield as will protect its secrets from becoming the property of the whole community. Houses are now built without doors. But it is bad policy to leave the doors always open. The house should be a shrine in every heart to which only the very few are admitted.

collection, and his children will not come to Sunday School without a penny, and that means much, with many children and but small wages."

Kindness to Mother.

It is too frequently the case that when the children are grown up, the mother is set aside. Those whom she bore and reared with the greatest solicitude do not always remember what they owe to her love. On this subject a lady writes these thoughtful words: "Who guarded you in health, and comforted you when ill? Who hung over your little bed when you were fretful, and put the cooling draught to your parched lips? Who taught you how to pray and gently helped you how to read? Who has borne with your faults and has been kind and patient in your childish ways? Who loves you still and who contrives and works friend's mother or father calls for a mourning tribute, in token of respect. The season for complimentary mourning is extremely short, and the transition to colors sudden. In our own country there is a movement in favor of less expensive funerals, especially among the very poor, to whom the death of a relative means an expenditure that is out of the question. It is no longer considered necessary to have a host of acquaintances, some of them of the most distant sort, follow the deceased to the grave. Private funerals, attended only by the immediate relatives and a few friends are growing in favor. There are instances without number where families have impoverished themselves in order to gratify a desire for a "fashionable funeral." People are beginning to understand, however, that the grave is the least appropriate place of all at which to indulge the passion for worldly display.

Pleasures of Camping Out.

There are few summer experiences that will afford greater pleasure and wholesome recreation than camping out. In many parts of the country, thousands of families make it a point to camp under canvas for at least a few days every July or August.

Church Membership.

...gions on the Christian Endeavor
...for the Week Beginning August 23.
...Ma 10: 16-33.

CONCEPTIONS of the Church have differed in every age, and have varied among people who are contemporaries. In the enormous number of sects there is still an endless variety of views about the church, the conditions of admission, the duties of members, and the way in which it should be governed. Christ left no directions on the subject, but his followers have been very industrious in supplying the omission. Formalists have been prescribed and elaborate systems devised to make the church exclusive and shut out from it all who do not believe this or that, or who would not submit to some particular rite. We are only to read the four gospels to see how different this is to Christ's intention. Personal loyalty to himself, penitence for sin, faith in his love and obedience are all that is required of his follower. When we realize this, the question of church-membership is simplified. It comes a declaration of allegiance to Christ, a pledge of loyalty to him. The convert who joins the church here, the doctrines are held tight that he believes, it is a mere external. Joining a church is essentially a confession of this. It is as when a man joins the army. He may be in the infantry, or cavalry, or artillery, or in the engineer's corps; but in whatever branch of the service he is, he is a soldier, and that is the object for him. He is expected to obey orders, to defend his country, and to combat his enemies. So the church of Christ has many parties and associations, but essentially one. Every member is bound first of all in loyalty to Christ and afterward in brotherhood with his fellowmembers of every name. In joining a church, whatever its name may be, is essentially an enlistment in his service, a declaration of adherence to Christ's principles to be the law of the church. With this is the love of his brethren. The people who are living the same life are comrades, having the same objects; they have a community of interests and share the same joys and blessings. Christ expects them to associate together and his institution of the Lord's Supper was expressly designed to emphasize this association. All who have joined themselves to him, having been freed from the world and sanctified themselves his followers, are to show their brotherhood with each other by partaking of a meal together. This is in remembrance of his command with a ban that is deeply pathetic. As we see them flattered by their politics, their trade, or other bonds of sympathy; as they associate dinners and enjoy social converse, we understand the principles of Christ's institution. Thus, as the great preacher has said, the line of division is vertical, not horizontal. We have the upper classes separated from the lower, but all who are on the side of Christ, whether they be rich or poor, are on the same side of the line, and on the other side those who are opposed to him or indifferent to him, and the rich and poor are found there. This is sufficient to indicate a duty. Those who expect to be saved through Christ are expected to put themselves on record. So much is due to Christ, so that the world shall not say that his followers are ashamed of him.

A Sabbath Service at Golgotha.

"As if a door in heaven should be opened, and then closed suddenly."

THE soft spring air unstirred by breeze,
By thin clouds veiled the golden light,
As in the Holy Land we wait—
The Holy City in our sight.

The sacred place where Jesus walked,
The Mount of Olives rising near.
A chime of bells through stillness sweet,
With silver voice to listening ear.
The Holy Land—Jerusalem,
The Home Land and the Heavenly Land

Are sweet because we trust our Lord,
And hold his tender, nail-pierced hand.
We sing the dear old sacred hymns,
The hymns so often sung at home,
And which we trust we still shall sing
When to our Father's Home we come.

Oh, wondrous Sabbath! hallowed place!
What memories in our souls uprise!
We almost see the blessed Lord,
Who for our sakes on Calvary dies!
Still vibrant is the soft spring air,
With the dear Sufferer's anguished cry
We hear its echo in our souls,
This blest Lord's Day on Calvary.

O Jesus, Master, dearest Lord!
Our hearts are full of love to Thee,
We consecrate ourselves anew
Where thou didst die on Calvary.
Again we lift our hands to Thee,
And gladly put them in Thine own,
And only ask the blessed boon
To live and die for Thee alone.
Oh, in a new and richer sense,
May thy dear presence with us go,
A holy power to fill our lives,
And lead us all our journey through.

Times of Culmination.

Twenty-three Reasons for Believing the Times of the Gentiles are Near Their End.

BY HENRY VARLEY.*

THE eleven reasons already enumerated are by no means the only ground we have for entertaining the opinion that we are nearing the time of final consummation. Twelve others, if less conspicuous to the public eye, are no less cogent.

12. The time for the fulfilment of the New Covenant, involving the national resuscitation and the spiritual regeneration of Judah and Israel, according to God's promise, is at hand.

13. The fact that the time of the "ingrafting" of Israel, in order to national pre-eminence as the Lord's chosen people and his "executive" on the earth, is contemporary with the time of his breaking in pieces of Gentile government.

14. The solemn truth, that if righteousness, peace, goodness, longevity, and well-being of the millions of the earth, be the Divine intention in regard to government, the incompetency and unfitness of all rule and authority to secure these results has been during "the Times of the Gentiles" fully demonstrated.

15. The proved indisposition and inability of all existing monarchies and legislatures to rule in righteousness, and their practical infidelity as to any responsibility on their part to God as the Supreme Lawgiver.

16. The fact that "glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and goodwill toward [amongst] men," are results which have not been attained by any existing form of government on the earth.

17. The further fact that human government of every known form and character possible to men has, after an experience covering nearly 6,000 years, been proved an ignominious and disastrous failure.

18. That the greatest need of the world of 1896 is a wise competent ruler. That Jesus Christ the Lord is that Supreme and Competent Ruler.

19. That the coming of Lord Jesus Christ, is therefore, not only "the hope of the Church," but will bring and secure, after "the great duty of his wrath," the salvation and deliverance of the world.

20. The coming of the Lord Jesus Christ into the air, there to receive his prepared people to himself, may now, therefore, be anticipated with joyful confidence and expectation at any time, and for the following cogent reason:

21. The times of the Lord Jesus Christ, when He shall reign as King over the whole earth, are not contemporary with "the Times of the Gentiles," but they immediately succeed them.

22. The Stone (Jesus Christ) which Daniel saw fall upon the fully-developed image and break it into pieces, clearly gives the arrival of the crisis.

23. The scene is one of the most solemn judgment. The majestic words spoken by the great prophet may fittingly close this paper. "Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them. And the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth" (Dan. 2: 34, 35). Thus shall "the earth be filled with the knowledge of the Lord."

RUNNING THE GAUNTLET.

OR

By W. E. S. BAKER.

CHAPTER III.

After the Picnic.

THE boys complained of having stiff limbs, from kicking the football; the girls yawned and were tired; and all were more or less hungry. Then it was, that Mr. Plummer's bell rang out again, merrily, and a host of children and adults soon came flocking to the stand, each to receive a large piece of cake; while Mr. Plummer, to keep off the stragglers and give the little girls a better chance, would occasionally throw a handful of peanuts to the outside crowd; or test their powers of vision by "skying" a few pennies and laughing heartily at the efforts of the scrambling band of dirty, ragged urchins to get the pennies, as they descended from the tree tops.

Mrs. Seymour was busy at the cake stand, when Farmer Paramore came along with his coat off, walking arm in arm with the pastor, Doctor Jones, and Deacon Slowfoot, who seemed quite mollified.

"You see, marm, we have made up, and it's all O. K. now, and no fuss what's'ever," the deacon said. "I tell you, that last game was just the best thing I ever see. I beat Plummer out of his boots; but, phew! it makes a feller tired at my age! Any more sponge cake left, marm? My appetite ain't subsided, neither."

Just then Mr. Walter's carriage was seen coming along the road, at the edge of the grove, driven by a servant. Close by was Mr. Walter, and, walking by his side, was his daughter Carrie, with her hair hanging loosely down her back, and her face red with the excitement and exertion of the day.

Mrs. Seymour recognized them when they were some distance off, and thinking that Carrie was looking for her, and that the child would bring Mr. Walter to her, and perhaps make some embarrassing remarks about "taking her home to be her mamma," Mrs. Seymour rose and walked rapidly in a different direction, far down the grove.

She happened to light just upon the spot where Milton and Carrie had been in the morning, and she saw the initials "M. S.," "C. W.," cut in the smooth bark of the beech tree, and could not help breathing a gentle "God bless them both," a prayer which came not from her lips only, but from her heart. She also saw blood-stained leaves around, where Milton and George Browne had fought in the morning, and it impressed her most forcibly with the fact that her son was not perfect. She had tried to bring the boy up "in the way he should go," but, alas for human effort, he was still disobedient, full of mischief, and even inclined to positive wickedness.

Then her thoughts flew back to her home in another land, and certain sad circumstances connected with it, and in a dispirited mood she moaned out the verse of a song:

Oh, then to the Rock let me fly,

Then again, her mind dwelt upon Scripture, and she remembered verses from Proverbs: "A child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame." "Correct thy son, and he shall give thee rest; yea, he shall give thee delight unto thy soul."

Wearied with the day's work, she sat down upon a fallen log, for a moment, and, without intending it, or supposing such a thing were possible, she fell asleep, and was soon soaring off in the boundless regions of dreamland. She dreamed that a tall gentleman with a mask on, stood beside her, while close by was her son.

Carrie Walter, an unknown gentleman, and a tall and handsome young woman. All around them were thousands of little angels, soaring about, and appearing to be very busy.

Presently, several of them began to hammer a black substance on an anvil, after heating the material in a fiery forge, fanned by angel wings, and soon there emerged a long golden bar, with a sharp point on one end, and a large round head at the other. When it was finished, ten of the little sprites flew with it right over to where the six persons referred to were standing, and, instantly, thousands of angels appeared, and surrounded the party, so that it was impossible to move an inch either way. Then the point of the golden bar was placed against Milton's side, and a dozen sprites began hammering upon it with small golden mallets, and driving it into his side, and clear through his person. He screamed before it touched him, and while it was being driven through; but after it had pinned him to a tall lady beside him, he laughed, and was happy again, and so it was with all of them. The mysterious bar was driven through all the parties, Mrs. Seymour being the last on the line. As it came near to her, she cried out with fear, and, as the continued strokes of the mallets forced it further and further, with great pain to her, through her side, she fairly shrieked, awoke with a sort of nightmare, and sprang to her feet, covered with a cold perspiration. Upon looking at her watch she perceived that she could not have slept more than two minutes, yet such are the boundless capacities of mental power, that a dream which covers even a year of time, really occupies but a few seconds.

Mrs. Seymour looked about her and was mortified to see Mr. Walter and little Carrie close by, and apparently going from her; and, although Carrie's head was turned, she repeatedly looked back. Could it be possible, thought Mrs. Seymour, that Mr. Walter had seen her in that ridiculous plight, and yelling like a wild Indian? The very thought of it made the widow tremble.

Returning toward the main stand, she had not walked far before she heard the sound of approaching music. The village band, followed by nearly the whole party of excursionists, was winding up the day with a tramp around the grove, singing in accord with the instrumental musing. The leaders in the march wondered why Mrs. Seymour was wandering, alone, so far from the focus of the picnic, and why she looked so pale and forlorn.

As soon as Farmer Paramore perceived Mrs. Seymour, he ordered the music and singing to cease, and, mounting a stump, made this little stump speech and proposal:

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—Whatever fun we may have had to-day, we owe entirely to the genius of the lady who projected this picnic, and to the man who executed it, so I propose three cheers for Mrs. Seymour, and three more for Mr. Plummer."

The drums began to roll instantly, and such a shout went up from the hundreds of happy participants as the oldest trees in that splendid grove had never heard before. Probably the widow was pleased with this little episode, but an observer of faces could readily perceive that, down beneath that smiling face and sunny eye, a worm was gnawing at her heart-strings!

The last bell had rung; the benches and tables were all collected and loaded into the wagons by the committees; and the line of march homeward was taken up. But before starting, Mrs. Seymour took her son Milton, and, passing along the edge of the grove, she paused at the curve of the lane on an immense flat rock, out of which was growing a large oak tree.

"See, my son," said the widow, "see that oak growing out of the solid rock; how can that be possible?"

"I do not understand, mother. It looks as if the tree had forced itself through the stone, but, as I suppose, that cannot be, do tell me how it is."

"My dear, the little acorn which was washed by the rain, or blown by the wind into the soil beneath this heavy boulder, took root there, and so stupendous are the quiet and steady forces of nature, that the little twig grew, year after year, up against the bottom of the rock, until finally, the pressure was so incessant and powerful that the small tree broke through a fissure in the rock, and saw the light of heaven for the first time, after feeling the sun's warming influences for years. Now you see that this noble and stately oak tree has silently and imperceptibly forced open the fissure, wider and wider, until the tree appears to have grown from the rock."

"My son, you may learn a useful lesson from this quiet, immense force of nature. I saw you this afternoon conversing with some rude boys, not belonging to our party. I heard them swear, and take even the sacred name of Jesus in vain. I heard them propose to go and rob 'old Hirst's' apple orchard, and, that proposition not being seconded, heard them utter filthy words; heard them accuse each other of stealing and lying; and finally listened to them coaxing George Browne and you to run away from home on next Sunday and come to this place, and they would take you to Kelly's dam to fish! Oh! my son, after all my instructions, how could you listen to their wicked words and be unmoved?"

"Why, mother dear, I meant no harm, indeed I didn't; and I would never go with such blackguards, nor do, nor talk, as they do—"

"Stop, my son; if you associate with vicious companions be sure that their influence, although silent and imperceptible, like the power of nature in this acorn, to force its way through the immense rock, will affect you. You cannot hear profane and disgusting language without its having an effect upon your mind. Oh! my son, when will you learn that little sins lead to great crimes:

A pebble on the streamlet's brink,

Hath turned the course of many a river;

A drop on the baby plant,

Hath warped the mighty oak forever."

The Seymour carriage brought up the rear of the procession home. They left the grove after the last rays of midsummer sun had ceased to tip with gold even the highest poplar on these grand old estates. A drive over hill and dale, partly by moonlight, brought them, by nine o'clock to Brookdale, tired, no doubt, and ready for rest; but that day was ever looked back to by the participants in the picnic as the brightest of the year, while Mr. Plummer and Mrs. Seymour had the great pleasure of knowing that their efforts to give others happiness has been successful.

Mr. Walter's carriage drove up just as Milton was hitching the horse to the post in front of his mother's cottage. It was driven by a servant; as Mr. Walter was on horseback and had gone home.

A little girl in the Walter carriage reached out and said:

"Teacher, mayn't I kiss you good night? Oh! we have had such a sweet time."

"And I want to kiss you, too, teacher," said Carrie Walter.

Who will not say that the two kisses from the lips of innocence and purity were not some compensation for the anxiety, toil and weariness of the day?

"Good night, dears; God bless you," said the widow.

The picnic was the subject of discussion the next day in every home in the village. It had stirred the stagnant church life and destined to do much more. Before many days were past the energy which had produced the picnic had already focussed on a new point. What that was may be gathered from the following conversation which occurred a few weeks after the picnic:

"There's trouble brewin' in the camp; I know it," said Deacon Slowfoot, addressing the staid and good old pastor, Dr. Jones.

"How so, deacon? We must not be suspicious, nor judge our brother, because, while man looks at actions, and listens to words, God regards only the heart, and judges by motives; pray what is it?"

"Well, you see's how it is; Finnerly and that Seymour woman are stuck up about that picnic."

"And you, deacon, were pleased and benefited by it, I hope?" mildly asked the pastor.

"No, sir! no, sir! it wa'n't worth the botheration. Them youngsters game a heap o' trouble."

"But the dear friends you speak of have infused fresh life and interest into the bath School. How is it, deacon, you must give credit where it is justly due."

"Yes, and now they intend to take hands at the church, sir; and the thing'll be a preliminary meeting to elect o' the old pastor, and try a new one. I see it, parson, clear as daylight, and I know it will be the ruin of Brookdale church, sir."

The deacon might have been more frank and explicit, and not have tried to make himself out a prophet, for he had requested to sign a call for a special meeting of the church, to see what could be done to improve the temporal and spiritual condition of that branch of Zion. The old pastor, who had not, as yet, heard of the movement, regarded the matter rather seriously, for he bowed his head, and made no reply.

The church had dwindled down, in a congregation of three hundred or more, to fifty or sixty worshippers, and consisted of the old standbys. The larger portion of the community either went to church at all, or walked to the neighboring village to hear a pastor who interested them. On the Sunday following the special meeting referred to, the pastor, Dr. Jones, preached from Matthew 23: "Then how wilt thou do in the kingdom of Jordan?" It certainly was very solemn discourse, and told them only that their support in death, as well as their hope and trust during life, was in Christ only. Not over fifty persons were present, and they seemed to be thinking more about living than dying; not their own business than the Lord's; not of their farms than the interests of the vineyard. And thus matters had gone on, year after year, until there was but little spirit left in the church, and the decline of religion by the professed followers of Jesus could not but affect unfavorably the whole region. Only a few offered daily the Psalmist's earnest prayer: "Wilt thou revive us again; that thy people may rejoice in thee?"

To make matters worse, old Deacon Slowfoot, the Superintendent, an ignorant and envious man, and, moreover, an old Christian, forgetting how Moses, Joshua, David, and the prophets and apostles had arisen, "early in the morning," to worship God, had changed the session from morning to afternoon, and engendering indolence in the youth in this arrangement more than half the sacred hours of the Lord's day were wasted in bed, or in idleness, if not mischief. The children received much less religious instruction; because, when religious worship is neglected, or indifferent offered, the family altar and home services are too often suspended, and Satan omits to profit by such a condition of affairs. In this instance, finding old Deacon and hearts full of worldliness, he had away with all his poisoned arrows, the soft hearts and impressive minds of the youth, while they were fresh, in the early part of the day; then, the teacher and others, while sowing the seed of the kingdom, in the afternoon, invariably find that it had fallen upon the wayside, and that the birds of the air, or the deer in some shape or other, had scattered and destroyed the seed, and left the soil of the heart harder than ever.

The state of affairs had a most unfavorable effect upon Milton Seymour. His mother was a godly woman; but all around him he saw Christians whose practical life contradicted their professions, and it caused him to unite with George Browne in thinking religion a farce, and the Bible a mass of fables and myths, instead of the "power of God unto salvation."

While the Brookdale people are preparing for their special church meeting, we will look a little into the social life of the Seymours and Brownes and Walters, and they all play an important part in the story. But, first, we must record a conversation which occurred on the first day after the picnic.

THE BOOK SHELF

A Syrian Story-Teller.*

WHEN we reached the cafe, at least forty men were seated on the long bench, or on stools and mats around the one chair of the establishment. On this chair sat a strikingly tall, slender man dressed eccentrically in a hybrid suit. Red shoes and checked European trousers covered the lower half of his body; a close-fitting scarlet vest embroidered with gold thread, white puff-sleeves, and a red turban set on the top of his head among a mass of curls, completed his costume. His face, unlike a give, immobile countenances of the without him, was alight with interest, a expression changing every second; his eyes rolling in anger one moment; a sorrow or fear coming into them the next. He gesticulated wildly, and now in deep guttural tones, now in a soft, low voice, he addressed his audience. His audience regarded him with some interest, occasionally nodding and smiling to each other. The attendants moved about noiselessly, pausing to listen whenever the speaker's voice rose to some special climax, then, as it subsided, they went on again.

At last the orator looked about, clapped his hands over his head, and stopped talking. He gazed into space during a brief moment more than a minute, then broke out with a shout, and continued his speech.

"What is going on! Political primaries?" he had whispered to David during a brief pause.

"What are political primaries, sir?" he asked.

"The folly of my question and did you not see that?" he asked what the speaker was saying.

"He is a professional story-teller," answered David. "Poor people come here to pass the time. They pay a penny for coffee, and then another penny apiece to this man, and he tells them stories all the evening. He has just finished one, and he is about to begin another in a minute."

Anxious to hear what wonderful tale the man would tell, I asked David to ask the next story as it went on. I scarcely finished my request, when the man began to speak, David following him with a whispered translation. I listened to the plot as nearly as I can remember it. There was once a prince (or sheik) who lived in the daughter of a king who ruled a country across the desert. The king was poor, after the manner of he-shes; and the king would not give him his daughter, but said she should marry a prince who was in his court.

The young prince watched his chance, and he got her from her father's palace, and he fled with her. They had ridden a day's journey when they saw the king and his army in hot pursuit. The sheik and his life party turned and attacked the king's army, enacting such prodigies of valor that the king's men were beaten. The king then used his sword to kill the king, but the daughter (Pocahontas-like) threw herself between them and begged her father's pardon, when the prince, with true fairy-tale magic, granted.

The king, grateful for his deliverance, gave the lovers and invited them to live in his court. The sheik accepted the invitation and, dismissing his followers, rode back with his father-in-law. But, however, had they reached the palace when his majesty ordered the youth to be bound and buried up to the neck in earth, forbidding all people to succor him.

In this uncomfortable state the unhappy sheik remained for three days, until a friend went secretly to his brother and told him the story. The brother raised an army and engaged the king in a prolonged and circumstantially related battle, in which, as far as I could gather, every combatant killed at least twenty men. How, from a sordid mathematical standpoint, they reconciled this Oriental Kilkenny cat problem, when they came to settle up at the end of the row, I don't pretend to say. In Eastern war-stories a hero seems to be of no earthly use unless, single-handed, he can kill anywhere from fifty to a hundred opponents or put a whole troop to flight.

I left the cafe in the middle of this interesting battle so I shall never know the outcome. Whether the half-buried sheik was released by his brother, or wholly interred by the king, must ever remain a mystery.

I have repeated the story at length to show in how slight things an Eastern audience may be interested. It is impossible to imagine an American restaurant crowd listening for three hours to the tale of Ali-Baba and the Forty Thieves, or Bluebeard. But realism in literature has not yet reached Syria, and at coffee-house recitals the romantic school is still all-powerful. Such an audience would make the fortune of a Western theatrical manager.

Daily Bible Study.*

STUDY the Bible daily. Regularity counts for more in Bible study than most people fancy. The spasmodic student, who at certain seasons gives a great deal of time to the study of the Word, and at other seasons quite neglects it, even for days at a time, does not achieve the results that he does who plods on regularly day by day. The Bereans were wise as well as "noble" in that they searched the Scriptures daily." (Acts 17: 11; see also R. V.) A man who is well known among the Christian college students of America, once remarked at a student convention, that he had been at many conventions and had received great blessings from them, but the greatest blessing he had ever received was from a convention where there were only four persons gathered together. The blessing had come to him in this way. These four had covenanted together to spend a certain portion of every day in Bible study. Since that day much of his time had been spent on the cars or in hotels and at conventions, but he had tried to keep that covenant, and the greatest blessing that had come to him in his Christian life had come through this daily study of the Word. No one who has not tried it realizes how much can be accomplished by setting apart a fixed portion of each day, (it may not be more than fifteen or thirty minutes, but it surely should be an hour) for Bible study, and keeping it sacredly for that purpose under all circumstances. Many will say I cannot spare the time. It will be time saved. Lord Cairns, one of the busiest as well as most eminent men of his day, before his death testified that the first two hours of every day were given to the study of the Bible and prayer, and he attributed the great achievements of his life to that fact. It will not do to study the Bible only when we feel like it. It will not do to study the Bible only when we have leisure. We must have fixed principles and habits in this matter, if we are to study the Bible to the greatest profit. Nothing that we do will be more important than our Bible study, and it cannot give way to other less important things. What regularity in eating is to physical life, regularity in Bible study is to spiritual life. Fix upon some time, even if it is no more than fifteen minutes to start with, and hold to it until you are ready to set a longer period.

Select for your Bible study the best portion of the day that you can give to it. Do not put your Bible study off until nearly bed-time, when the mind is drowsy. It is well to take a parting verse for the day when one retires for the night, but this is not the time for study. No study demands all that there is in a man as Bible study does. Do not take the time immediately after a heavy meal. The mind is more or less torpid after a heavy meal, and it is unwise to put it on the stretch then. It is almost the unanimous opinion of those who have given this subject careful attention, that the early hours of the day are the best for Bible study, if they can be secured free from interruption. It is well, wherever possible, to lock yourself in and lock the world out, when you are about to give yourself up to the study of the Bible.

The Bards of Wales.

FEW races have done more toward preserving an ancient language and perpetuating the musical traditions of a once great and powerful people than the Welsh. Welsh societies for the preservation of the tongue spoken by the ancient bards, and of the music sung by the harpists and harpers hundreds of years ago, exist to-day in many parts of the world. It is claimed by their historians that the minstrels have ever sung so grandly and so sweetly as their own, and even the love of music and rare skill in the man, who had been forced to seek an asylum in the Mogul empire. It was called the Peacock Throne to distinguish it from other royal chairs, and because it was decorated with the figures of two huge peacocks. The throne was six feet long by four feet wide, and stood on six massive legs, which were of solid gold inlaid with rubies, emeralds, diamonds, and all kinds of precious stones. The tails of the peacocks were expanded fan-like behind the throne, and they, too, were inlaid with pearls, emeralds, and other gems of suitable coloring. The whole was surmounted by a canopy of gold supported by twelve pillars likewise studded with diamonds and precious stones, the border of the canopy being made of a fringe of beautiful pearls. Between the two peacocks perched a life-size parrot, which was carved out of a single emerald. The royal umbrellas, which are appendages to most Oriental thrones, were made of the finest silks, and were fringed with pearls, the handles being of solid gold studded with diamonds. It has been said by many writers that the famous Koh-i-noor diamond was at one time owned by the Shah Jehan. This throne has been valued at $30,000,000, and this figure is doubtless not exaggerated, for the Mogul Emperors were wonderfully rich monarchs. When the Persians sacked Delhi in 1739, they destroyed the Peacock Throne, and carried off its jewels. A simple block of white marble now stands in the private audience hall in the palace of the Mogul Emperors at Delhi to show where this gorgeous chair once stood, and from which it has been forever removed.

A GROUP OF WELSH BARDS.

...strants is a leading trait of the Welsh character. One of the great annual events in Wales is the National Eisteddfod, at which prizes are awarded for poems, for musical productions and for playing. One of our illustrations on this page presents a group of Welsh bards (poets and singers) in national costume at the Eisteddfod which took place last month at Llandudno, where prizes of gold, and silver wreaths were bestowed on those whose efforts were most meritorious. So high was the standard of musical taste among the judges that the principal competition—an ode on the life of the Great—was resultless, none of the compositions being considered of sufficient merit to win the silver wreath. The principal competition was that in which the large choirs engaged in the rendering of one of Handel's masterpieces. All the Welsh music is of an elevated character, grand and uplifting, such as must have been sung and played by the bards of the court of David, the Harpist of Israel, who dedicated the finest musical and poetic talent of his time to the praise and service of Jehovah.

The Palestine Lily.

Lines written on receiving a Lily of the Field, from "The Christian Herald."

I N thought I go beyond the sea,
And stand in sacred Galilee;
Where Jesus walked in days of yore,
And spake as man ne'er spake before.
I view an eager multitude,
That round the Holy Teacher stood;
The wise and gentle words to hear,
Which filled their hearts with faith and cheer.
He taught them of their Father's care,
And pointed to the lilies fair,
In garments of rare beauty dressed,
More rich than Solomon possessed.
He said, "Consider how they grow,
Much more on thee doth God bestow."
"God notes the tiny sparrow's fall,
And swiftly hears each prayerful call,
That rises to his throne above,
Upon the wings of trust and love."
Though Christ from earth has gone away,
His teachings here abide to-day;
And longing hearts accept the Word,
The thronging multitudes then heard.
O, Lily, from far Palestine,
Reminding me of love divine;
Our Saviour looked on such as thee,
When he discoursed in Galilee.
Thy lesson, Lily of the Field,
Sweet comfort to my soul shall yield;
The hand that clothes the flower fair,
Will ever hold me in its care.

It is a narrative of whatever is best and most inspiring in the annals of our country. The author has selected the most striking and important parts of the story, and has recited those parts with fervor and enthusiasm. All that is dull and commonplace in our past has been eliminated from the glowing narrative in the People's History. The vital essence is retained. The useless has given place to the useful, the dull to the romantic.

Among other important features this book contains portraits of prominent statesmen, including:

- William McKinley, Whitelaw Reid, David B. Hill, A. P. Gorman, Rev. Chas. H. Parkhurst, President Cleveland, General John Bidwell, Gen'l James B. Weaver, Gen'l Nelson A. Miles, and Others.

July ushered in a series of important gatherings and anniversaries. First came the Women's Christian Temperance Union of New Jersey on July 2, attracting a generous attendance of members of that organization. Then followed what has always been a notable event at Ocean Grove, the celebration of the Fourth of July, when

On July 28, the Fifteenth National Temperance Camp Meeting was held, lasting six days, during which many notabilities in the Temperance cause, including Hon. John G. Woolley, Rev. C. H. Mead, Rev. A. G. Lawson, Col. Geo. W. Bain, and others, participated. Next, the King's Daughters held their Eighth Summer Meeting on August 3, when addresses were delivered by Bishop John

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

THE GREAT LAW-SUIT.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: 1. John 2: 1, "We have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous."

S

TANDING in a courtroom, you say to yourself: "At this bar crime has often been arraigned; at this witness stand the oath has often been taken; at this jurors' bench the verdict has been rendered; at this judge's desk sentence has been pronounced." But I have to tell you to-day of a trial higher than any Oyer and Terminer or Circuit or Supreme or Chancery. It is the trial of every Christian man for the life of his soul. This trial is different from any other in the fact that it is both civil and criminal.

The issues at stake are tremendous, and I shall in my sermon show you, first, what are the grounds of complaint; then, who are the witnesses in the cause, and lastly, who are the advocates.

When a trial is called on the first thing is to have the indictment read. Stand up then, O, Christian man, and hear the indictment of the court of high heaven against thy soul. It is an indictment of ten counts, for thou hast directly or indirectly broken all the ten commandments. You know how it thundered on Sinai and when God came down how the mountain rocked and the smoke ascended as from a smoldering furnace, and the darkness gathered thick, and the loud, deep trumpet uttered the words: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die!" Are you guilty, or not guilty? Do not put in a negative plea too quick, for I have to announce that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. There is none that doeth good; no, not one. Whosoever shall keep the whole law, yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." Do not, therefore, be too hasty in pronouncing yourself not guilty.

This lawsuit before us also charges you with the breaking of a solemn contract. Many a time did we promise to be the Lord's. We got down on our knees and said: "O, Lord, I am thine now and forever." Did you keep the promise? Have you stood up to the contract? I go back to your first communion. You remember it as well as if it were yesterday. You know how the vision of the Cross rose before you. You remember how from the head and the hands and the side and the feet there came bleeding forth these two words: "Remember Me." You recall how the cup of communion trembled in your hand when you first took it; and as in a seashell you may hear, or think you hear, the roaring of the surf even after the shell has been taken from the beach, so you lifted the cup of communion and you heard in it the surging of the great ocean of a Saviour's agony; and you came forth from that communion service with face shining as though you had been on the Mount of Transfiguration; and the very air seemed tremulous with the love of Jesus, and the woods and the leaves and the grass and the birds were brighter and sweeter-voiced than ever before, and you said down in the very depths of your soul: "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." Then you kept the bargain, O, Christian man? Have you not sometimes faltered when you ought to have been true? Have you not been proud when you ought to have been humble? Have you not played the coward when you ought to have been the hero? I charge it upon you and I charge it upon myself—we have broken the contract.

Still further: this lawsuit claims damages at your hands. The greatest slander on the Christian religion is an inconsistent professor. The Bible says religion is one thing; we, by our inconsistency, say religion is some other thing, and what is more deplorable about it is that people can see faults in others while they cannot see any in themselves. If you shall at any time find some miserable old gossip, with imperfections from the crown of her head to the sole of her foot, a perfect blotch of sin herself, she will go tattling, tattling, tattling, all the years of her life about the inconsistencies of others, having no idea that she is inconsistent herself. God save the world from the gossip, female and male! I think the males are the worst! Now the chariot of Christ's salvation goes on through the world; but it is our inconsistencies, my brethren, that block up the wheels, while all along the line there ought to have been cast nothing but palm branches, and the shout should have been lifted: "Hosanna to the Son of David!"

Now, you have heard the indictment read. Are you ready to plead guilty or not guilty? Perhaps you are not ready yet to plead. Then the trial will go on. The witnesses will be called, and we shall have the matter decided. In the name of God I now make proclamation: Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! whosoever hath anything to offer in this trial in which God is the plaintiff and the Christian soul the defendant, let him now step forth and give testimony in this solemn trial.

The first witness I call upon the stand in behalf of the prosecution is the World—all critical and observant of Christian character. You know that there are people around you who perpetually banquet on the frailties of God's children. You may know, if you have lived in the country, that a crow cares for nothing so much as carrion. There are those who imagine that out of the faults of Christians they can make a bridge of boats across the stream of death, and they are going to try it; but, alas for the mistake! When they get mid-stream away will go the bridge and down will go their souls to perdition. O World of the greedy eye and the hard heart, come on the stand now and testify in behalf of the prosecution against this Christian soul on trial. What do you know about this Christian man? "Oh," says the World, "I know a great deal about him. He talks about putting his treasures in heaven, but he is the sharpest man in a trade I ever knew. He seems to want you to believe that he is a child of God, but he is just full of imperfections. I do not know but I am a great deal better than he is now. Oftentimes he is very earthly, and he talks so little about Christ and so much about himself. I am very glad to testify that this is a bad man."

Stop, O World with the greedy eye and hard heart. I fear you are too much interested in this trial to give impartial evidence. Let all those who hear the testimony of this witness know that there is an old family quarrel between these two parties. There always has been a variance between the World and the Church, and while the World on the witness stand to-day has told a great deal of truth about this Christian man, you must take it all with much allowance, remembering that they still keep the old grudge good. O World of the greedy eye and the hard heart, that will do; you may sit down.

The second witness I call in this case is Conscience. Who art thou, O Conscience? What is your business? Where were you born? What are you doing here? "Oh," says Conscience, "I was born in heaven. I came down to befriend this man. I have lived with him. I have instructed him. I have warned him. I showed him the right and the wrong, advising him to take the one and eschew the other. I have kindled a great light in his soul. With a whip of scorpions I have scourged his wickedness, and I have tried to cheer him when doing right; and yet I am compelled to testify on the stand to-day that he has sometimes rejected my mission. Oh, how many cups of life have I pressed to his lips that he dashed down, and how often has he stood with his hard heel on the bleeding heart of the Son of God! It pains me very much that I have to testify against this Christian man, and yet I must, in behalf of him who will in no wise clear the guilty, say that this Christian man has done wrong. He has been worldly. He has been neglectful. He has done a thousand things he ought not to have done, and left undone a thousand things he ought to have done." That will do, Conscience. You can sit down.

The third witness I call in the case is an angel of God. Bright and shining one, what doest thou here? What hast thou to say against this man on trial? "Oh," says the angel, "I have been a messenger to him. I have guarded him. I have watched him. With this wing I have defended him, and oftentimes, when he knew it not, I led him into green pastures and beside the still waters. I snatched from him the poisoned chalices. When bad spirits came upon him to destroy him, I fought them back with infinite fierceness, and yet I have to testify to-day that he has rejected my mission. He has not done as he ought to have done. Though I came from the sky, he drove me back. Though with this wing I defended him, and though with this voice I wooed him, I have to announce his multiplied imperfections. I dare not keep back the testimony, for then I should not dare to appear again amongst the sinless ones before the great white Throne."

There is only one more witness to be called on behalf of the prosecution, and that is the great, the holy, the august, the omnipotent Spirit of God. We bow down before him. Holy Spirit, knowest thou this man? "Oh, yes," says the Holy One, "I know him. I have striven with him ten thousand times, and though sometimes he did seem to repent, he fell back again as often from his first estate. Ten thousand times ten thousand has he grieved me, although the Bible warned him, saying: 'Grieve not the Holy Ghost. Quench not the Spirit.' Yes, he has driven me back. Though I am the Third Person of the Trinity, he has trampled on my mission, and the blood of the Atonement that I brought with which to cleanse his soul, he sometimes despised. I came from the throne of God to convert, and comfort and sanctify, and yet look at that man and see what he is compared with what, unresisted, I would have made him."

The evidence on the part of the prosecution has closed. Now let the defense bring on the rebuttal testimony. What have you, O Christian soul, to bring in reply to this evidence of the world, of the conscience, of the angel and of the Holy Ghost? No evidence? Are all these things true? "Yes, Unclean, unclean," says every Christian soul. What? Do you not begin to tremble at the thought of condemnation?

We have come now to the most interesting part of this great trial. The evidence all in. The advocates speak. The profession of an advocate is full of responsibility. In England and the United States there have arisen men who in this profession have been honored by their race and thrown contempt upon those who the profession have been guilty of a great many meannesses. That profession will be honorable as long as it has attached to it such names as Mansfield, and Maule, and Story and Kent, and Southard and William Wirt. The court-room has many times been the scene of very marvellous and thrilling things. Some of you remember the famous Girard will case, where one of our advocates pleaded the cause of the Bible and Christianity in many an Anglo-Saxon, every paragraph a thunder-bolt.

Some of you have read of the famous trial in Westminster Hall of Warren Hastings, the despoiler of India. That great man had conquered India by splendid talents, by courage, by bribes, by gentle dishonesty. The whole world hailing him with applause or condemnation. Gathered in Westminster Hall, a place in which thirty kings had been inaugurated, was one of the most famous audiences ever gathered. Foreign Ministers and presidents sat there. Peers marched in, clad in ermine and gold. Mighty men and men from all lands looked down upon the scene. Amid all that pomp and splendour, and amid an excitement such as had seldom been seen in any court-room Edmund Burke advanced in a speech which will last as long as the English language, concluding with this burning charge, which made Warren Hastings cringe and cower: "I impeach him in the name of the Commons House of Representatives, whose trust he has betrayed; I impeach him in the name of the English nation, whose ancient honor he has sullied; I impeach him in the name of the people of India, whose rights he has trampled upon and whose country he has turned into a desert. And, lastly, in the name of human nature, in the name of both sexes, in the name of every age and rank, I impeach him as the common enemy and oppressor of all."

But I turn from the recital of these memorable occasions to a grander trial, and I have to tell you that in this trial of the Christian, for the life of his soul the advocates are mightier, wiser and more eloquent. The evidence all being in, severe and stern Justice rises on behalf of the prosecution to make his plea. He takes the Bible open in his hand, he reads the law, stern and inflexible, and the penalty: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Then he says: "O, thou Judge and Lawgiver, this is thine own statute, and all the evidence in earth and heaven agrees that this man has sinned against these enactments. Now let the sword leap from its scabbard. Shall a man go through the very flames of Sinai unsinged? Let the law be executed. Let judgment be pronounced. Let him demand that he die!"

O, Christian, does it not look very dark for thee? Who will plead on thy side in so forlorn a cause? Sometimes a man will be brought into a court of law, and he will have no friends and no money and the judge will look over the Bar and say: "Is there any one who will volunteer to take this man's case and defend him? And some young man rises up and says: 'I will be his counsel;' perhaps standing on that very point to a great and brilliant career. Now, in this matter of the soul, as you have nothing to pay for counsel, do you think that any one will volunteer? Yes, yes; I see One rise. He is a young man, only thirty-three years of age. I see his countenance suffused with tears and covered with blood, and all the galleries of heaven are thronged with the spectacle. Thanks be unto God, 'we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous.'

Oh, Christian soul, your case begins not better. I think, perhaps, after all, you may not have to die. The best Advocate in the universe has taken your side. None was ever so qualified to defend you. He knows all the law, all its demands, all its penalties. He is always ready. No new turn of the case can surprise him, and he will plead for you for nothing as earnestly as though you brought a world of treasure to his feet. Besides that, he has undertaken the case reeling amid his cups, and the blasphemer with the oath caught between his teeth.

Lo! The sun hides. Night comes down at mid-noon. The stars appear at noon to-day. The earth shudders and throbs. There an earthquake opens and a city sinks as a crocodile would crunch a child. Mountains roll in their sockets and send down their granite cliffs in avalanche of rock. Rivers pause in their chase for the sea, and ocean, uprearing, cries to flying

Alps and Himalaya. Beasts bellow and moan and snuff up the darkness: clouds fly like flocks of swift eagles. Great thunders beat and boom and burst. Stars shoot and fall. The Almighty, rising on his throne, declares that time shall be no longer, and the archangel's trump repeats it till all the living hear, and the continents of dead spring to their feet, crying: "Time shall be no longer!" Oh, on that day will you be ready?

I have shown you how well the Chris-

ON THE BANKS OF WESLEY LAKE.

Thousands who were as forlorn as you, as he has never lost a case. Courage, O Christian soul! I think that, after all, there may be some chance for you, for the great Advocate rises to make his plea. He says: "I admit all that has been proved against my client. I admit all these sins, more; but look at that wounded hand on mine and look at that other wounded hand, and at my right foot and at my left foot. By all these wounds I plead for his chance. Count all the drops of my tears. Count all the drops of my blood. By the humiliation of Bethlehem, by the sweat of Gethsemane, by the sufferings of the cross, I demand that he go free. On this arm he hath leaned; to this heart he hath flown; by my tears he hath washed; on my righteousness he hath depended. Let him go free. I am the ransom. Let him escape the law; I took the scourgings. Let the cup pass from him; I drank of the dregs. Put on him the crown of life, for I have worn the crown of thorns. Over against my throne of shame set the throne of triumph!"

Well, the counsel on both sides has been spoken, and there is only one more thing now remaining, and that is the awarding of the judgment. If you have ever been in a court-room you know the silence and solemnity when the verdict is about to be rendered or the judgment about to be given. About this soul on trial—shall it be saved or shall it be lost? Attention! above, around, beneath. All the universe cries, "Hear! hear!"

The Judge rises and gives this decision, never to be changed, never to be revoked: "There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus."

Soul that on Jesus hath leaned for repose, I will not, I will not, desert to his foes; that soul, though all hell should endeavor to shake, I never, no never, no, never forsake.

But, my friends, there is coming a day of trial in which not only the saint but the sinner must appear. That day of trial will come very suddenly. The farmer will be at the plow, the merchant will be in the counting-room, the woodman will be ringing his axe on the hickories, the weaver will have his foot on the treadle, the manufacturer will be walking amid the buzz of looms and the clack of flying machinery, the counsel may be at the bar, pleading the law, the minister may be in the pulpit reading the Gospel, the drunkard may be Sabbath evening during during July and August, and Twilight meetings in the Temple. No other place in America can accommodate such vast audiences as are often simultaneously assembled at the different services at the Grove, and probably nowhere else, the world over, can there be found in like proportion the same type of high religious enthusiasm and fervor that characterizes these vast Gospel gatherings as a whole. There is a subtle influence in the Grove and its surroundings, in its simple, unostentatious people, its whole-heartedness, and the absolute sincerity of its religion, that puts cold formalism to flight and renders unresponsive, lukewarm meetings an impossibility. For all who meet there, it is a season of spiritual and physical rejuvenation, giving health to both soul and body.

The official Camp-Meeting programme, which will interest many of our readers, is as follows:

Thursday, Aug. 28, Preparation Day and Sacrament.

Friday, 29, Dr. J. M. Buckley, New York; Dr. J. H. Willey, Syracuse, N. Y.; Rev. J. G. Reed, Ocean Grove, N. J.

Saturday, 30, Bishop T. Bowman. Evening, Dr. Forbes, Duluth, Minn.

Sunday, 31, Bishop Wilson, M. E. Church South; miles of concrete pavement, its two lovely sheets of water—Wesley Lake and Fletcher Lake; its ocean pier and cool pavilions; its ever-crowded and famous board-walk, skirting the edge of the open Atlantic; its piney woods and abundant shade trees along streets and avenues, all combine to render it an ideal resort for the purposes for which it was planned. In the great Auditorium, capable of seating 9,600 auditors, there is now a magnificent pipe organ, which was presented by the Washington Square M. E. Church, of New York.

A GROUP OF SURF BATHERS.

All the musical services are conducted by Prof. Sweney, the well-known hymn composer. Rev. E. H. Stokes, President of the Camp Meeting Association, and "the Father of Ocean Grove," is foremost in all plans for Christian work, and is the head and front of every enterprise. Actively associated with him are Rev. A. E. Ballard, Geo. W. Evans, Rev. Geo. Hughes, Bishop Robert J. Andrews, Rev. Adam Wallace, Wistar H. Stokes, and many more consecrated men and women who for many years have devoted a considerable portion of their time and energies to the interest of the religious work.

One of the photographic illustrations shows a group of well-known leaders in the religious world who take a prominent part in the Summer Services at the Grove. Included in the group are: Drs. Wallace, Thomas and Sweney, Rev. C. H. Mead, Profs. Chambers, Daily and Allott, Col. Geo. W. Bain, Revs. Snowden Thomas, Babcock, Pickard and Evans, and Messrs. Brown, Smith, Bailey, Cummings and others. Thus far, no season has passed without marks of signal blessing in numerous conversions, the reclamation of many backsliders and the helping of thousands toward that higher life which makes for immortality.

Hardened Hearts.

"Every one that exalteth himself." We know how that is in school and college and business. Those who in the current phrase "know it all," cannot be taught. Smiles quotes as an illustration a famous violin-player. Whenever a pupil came to him to be taught, he asked him if he had received any instruction. If the pupil replied that he had, the great master charged him double fees, as he would have more trouble with him, in eradicating faults and overcoming his preconceived ideas. The lad who knew nothing about the instrument and was conscious of his ignorance, could be taught more easily. A colored man, very poor and very depraved, was converted in a revival, while a well-to-do white neighbor who was under conviction, could not find peace. The colored man was asked how it was. He replied: "The dear Lord comes along with the robe of his righteousness and he offers it to you. You say, 'I have a very good coat, no dust, or dirt or stains on it and it fits me all right. I dunno as I need a different one.' He comes to me and I look at it and I say, 'I want it right away,' and I strip off my ragged, dirty old coat and fling it away and take his robe and glad to get it." A self-righteous man is often more difficult to win than a wicked man.

tian will get off in his trial. Will you get off as well in your trial? Will Christ plead on your side or against you? Oh, what will you do in the last great assize, if your conscience is against you, and the world is against you, and the angels of heaven are against you, and the Holy Spirit is against you, and the Lord God Almighty is against you? Better this day secure an Advocate.

Liberal Korean Christians.

Mr. Miller, of Korea, reporting the opening of the new church at Seoul, says that the liberality of the native Christians is remarkable. Besides giving liberally of their small means, some of them carried wood ashes off the ditches and sold it to make money, the boys worked hard during play hours at preparing the site and carrying building materials—no small item in the cost.

Absalom's Defeat.

Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 30. II. Sam. 18: 9-17; 32-33. Golden Text, Ps. 1: 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WITH the terrible blow which Absalom's conspiracy was to him, David came into a life of closer dependence upon God, and those who were true to God and to the king were put to the proof. The two hundred men that followed Absalom "in their simplicity" (II. Sam. 15: 12), not aware of the plot which was brewing, could not have been so taken in if they had lived near to God. "Mine eyes are ever toward the Lord, and he shall pluck my feet out of the net" (Ps. 25: 15); their eyes could not have been unto the Lord. Ittai the Gittite needed just this crisis that God might bring his faithfulness to light. When the king set before him how little he could expect him, a stranger and an exile, to follow the apparently uncertain fortunes of a government now in such a state of crisis, the noble reply of Ittai was, "As the Lord liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether in life or death, even there also will thy servant be" (II. Sam. 15: 19-21). Hushai the Archite also came with his coat rent and earth upon his head, and offered himself for anything which the king shall appoint. With followers of such a type, David could go forward. Zadok the priest was among David's followers, and the Levites were with him carrying the ark of God. But the king knew that the Lord himself was with him: he as did the people when, in the days of Eli, they carried the ark into the battlefield (I. Sam. 4: 3-11). David knew his God better than to attempt to force his hand; he recognized God in all that happened, and no murmur or trace of self-pity comes out in his words to the priests: "Carry back the ark of God into the city: if I shall find favor in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again, and show me both it, and his habitation: but if he thus say, I have no delight in thee; behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him." He spoke in the dignity of faith which submits to him whom it trusts, and he appealed to Zadok: "Art not thou a seer? return into the city in peace. . . See, I will tarry in the plain of the wilderness, until there come word from you to certify me." Zadok obeyed, and the broken-spirited king, weeping in the midst of his weeping people, went up the Mount of Olives, where, later on, Jesus also wept over Jerusalem. But David was not alone: "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death" and this was his bitter experience just now, "I will fear no evil, for thou art with me, thy rod, and thy staff they comfort me."

David's Communion with God was continuous again: hearing of the treachery of Ahithophel, he prayed, "O Lord, I pray thee, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness" (II. Sam. 15: 37). Reaching the summit of the Mount of Olives, the king worshipped God. Again, when Shimei came and cursed the king, and his nephew Abishai, in hot-headed indignation, requested that he might immediately be slain, the answer of David, who saw all in the light of God, was wonderfully prophetic of David's son: "So let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, curse David, who shall then say, Wherefore hast thou done so? . . . Behold, my eyes are toward the Lord, how much more now may this Benjamite do it? Let him alone, and let him curse; for the Lord had bidden him. It may be that the Lord will look on mine affliction, and that the Lord will requite me good for his cursing this day" (II. Sam. 16: 5-14). God was present with David now.

Oh, how often has it taken some great trial and humiliation, some heart-breaking shock, to bring a child of God, who has once fallen, into the old child-like depen-his personal ambition was served, he stopped at nothing, the wisdom of the arch-enemy was in his counsels, and David had probably at one time leaned too much upon him (II. Sam. 16: 23) instead of inquiring of the Lord. But Hushai, David's friend, offered counsel to Absalom which should be more acceptable than Ahithophel's, which, had it been carried out, might have been fatal to king David. The sons of Zadok too were on David's side, and carried the news of what was doing in Jerusalem to the king. The crisis approached; the father and the son were prepared for battle, and perhaps never was there an encounter into which David went with less heart and yet with more consciousness that he was in the way of right.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

WELL worth careful study are the five chapters from the fifteenth to the nineteenth of this second book of Samuel which describe the events that form the subject of the lesson. The purely literary skill of the writer is master-he could yet turn to God and avow his shaken trust in him. Only a truly great man could have done that. Absalom, this time about twenty-three years of age, proud, ambitious and controlled by overweening vanity. The young man who could have chariots and footmen to run before him and carefully weigh the hair that was cut off his head every year; was aging after his nature. He was in Jerusalem now and his own master, no longer obliged to ask his father's permission to take twenty mile journey. With his counsellors about him, he is putting on the airs of royalty. Accepting one of Ahithophel's suggestions, which was agreeable to his coarse nature, he rejected another, not because it included a cold-blooded provision to poison his aged father to death, but because the alternative suggestion provided for a position in which he would be the chief figure. How low this young man must have sunk we may realize when we read of his considering a proposal to kill the old man whose love for him, even in his rebellion, is described in the most pathetic words of literature. In striking contrast is Ittai, stranger who had been welcomed at David's court and had conceived so strong an affection for him as to pledge himself to the exiled monarch, though his pledge might involve death. Joab was in the camp, too, true to David, still, with cruel loyalty, hard to manage, but unswerving in fidelity. He doubtless reproached himself for the part he had taken in bringing Absalom back, and when he heard of the young man's predicament, could not resist the temptation to put him to death and so deliver his master from his unnatural enemy. Then there is Ahithophel, whose desertion evidently cut David to the quick. A shrewd, clever statesman, with a grasp of the whole situation, yet so weak that when his advice was rejected, he went home and hanged himself. The group of one of the most interesting in history.

Under the thick boughs of a great oak. The scene of the battle was the wood of Ephraim. This was not in the territory belonging to Ephraim, but in a place east of the Jordan. It was chosen by David doubtless because it afforded vantage to a force so numerically inferior as his followers were to the enemy. An instance of this kind of warfare occurred during our early history. In 1775, in the disturbance occasioned by the French alliance with the Indians, against the English settlers, a fine English force was almost annihilated by an attack of a similar kind near Pittsburgh, Pa. David's trained warriors, some of whom had been with him in his younger days of wild warfare in the reign of Saul, would operate with deadly results in such a country.

Cast him into a great pit in the wood. That was a very different burial from the one Absalom had planned for himself when he reared in the valley the imposing tomb depicted in the illustration on this page. The monument still stands, and to this day the Jew casts a stone on it as he passes it. So suddenly may an illustrious man fall. As a great writer has said of another ambitious man who was suddenly hurled from a great position: Providence sometimes suffers a career of unexampled wickedness and ambition to go on from one degree of prosperity to another till the moment of doom arrives, when all is shattered by a single blow. There was long delay, but the hour of reckoning at length arrived. That hour at length came to Absalom. He had often been reproved and had hardened his neck. Now he was to be destroyed without remedy.

His head caught hold of the oak. It is almost ludicrous that the thing of which the young prince was so proud should have been the cause of his death. Yet it is often so. Many a girl who would have lived a happy innocent woman if she had been plain, has fallen into misery and died in poverty and neglect through the beauty she counted her greatest treasure. In past days many a man has come to a premature grave because of his skill in swordsmanship which made him arrogant and boastful, so that he provoked quarrels and at last fell in some fatal duel. King William II, of England, took an immense pride in the New Forest and heartlessly burned villages and made many of his villagers homeless that he might increase its size. It was in the recesses of that forest that he was murdered. There seems to be some mysterious law of retribution making fatal any object on which inordinate pride is lavished.

dence which he had abandoned! Perhaps, also, with the addition of a brokenness of spirit which only those who have been deeply convicted of their sin, and who have suffered intensely on account of its consequences on others, can know. Now David could not count his wicked son Absalom, nor yet the cursing Shimei, nor yet the treacherous Ahithophel, greater sinners than he was himself. And yet he must no longer sin by laxity in his dealings with his children, as he had done; his son's rebellion was not only against him, it was open revolt against God who had chosen his father to sit upon the throne. It was God's cause, and not a personal one, that David must maintain against his rebellious son. If he had been true to his God in his dealings with Amnon and with Absalom before, things would never have come to this pass. Every man of God who is a father must serve God first in all his dealings with his children.

Ahithophel was an unscrupulous and utterly wicked man; so long as the end of

ly. Not in Shakespeare or in the works of our ablest historians is this simple but thrilling narrative surpassed. The characters of the leaders are depicted with the hand of an artist and we are able to see them in the strongest light. David stands in the front, a man of sixty-two, or three, years old, prematurely aged by remorse, sorrow and trial. Flying from the capital, distressed as much by the thought that the hearts of his people had gone from him, as by the thought that it was his own son, his beloved, handsome son who had rebelled against him and was seeking his life; enduring patiently the insults and curses of his enemy and weeping as strong men seldom weep, under his accumulated troubles. Yet the strange characteristic of the man was that in this harassed condition, when his life was not safe from one hour to another, he could sit down and write Psalms. We can read his emotions in the Psalms that belong to this period, which in our collection are numbered 3, 55, 60, 100 and 143. Conscious, as he was, that his troubles were the result of his sin, great work to be accomplished before it can be claimed to have been conquered for the Gospel. Bishop Thoburn and his missionary co-workers in India proper, and faithful Christian missionaries in Ceylon have from time to time told the American people of the triumphs and progress of Christianity in the face of the combined opposition of the Buddhists, Hindus, Mohammedans, Parsees, and a hundred other religious sects or organizations, all of which, through their priests and leaders, have recognized in the religion of Jesus the rival that is destined to overthrow their ancient faith and worship.

Our illustrations on this page are from recent photographs kindly furnished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by the Misses Lech, American missionaries in India, as they present phases of life in that country that cannot fail to interest the reader. Here is a group surrounding a native story-teller, who is relating some merry tale for their amusement, each audibly giving him a small fee for his trouble. The story-teller is common in nearly all the Oriental lands. Another photograph is that of a fakir, or holy man—a fanatic who practises self-torture ostensibly to attain a greater degree of sanctity, and who sits in some public place, loaded with chains, or in such a distorted position as to excite commiseration from some and admiration from others. Concerning these fairs, the most remarkable stories are related. It is averred that some can throw themselves into a trance-like condition and so remain for many days, even undergoing burial, so complete is the suspension of all animation. After this strange and seemingly incredible ordeal, they usually seem to suffer no serious inconvenience beyond a slight emaciation. It is hardly necessary to add that such performances elicit the fakir greatly in the estimation of the superstitious and mystery-loving Hindus.

Idolatry has a prominent place in Indian philosophy, and whatever savors of the supernatural is widely venerated. Serpent-charmers, miracle-workers, magicians, mesmerizers, yogees, and spiritual jugglers of all sorts are accorded the utmost respect and attention. One of our photographs shows a fakir or devotee, with arms stretched in an upright position and surrounded by a curious group. The jugglers pretending to be endowed with divine power, but really by the use of tricks and devices common to jugglers and magic-workers, will apparently cause a seed to bud, grow blossom and bear fruit in a few minutes after planting; make a man enter a basket and then disappear, cause gold and silver to vanish, and do many other astonishing things. Some of these men call themselves Yahdoo-Wallah ("filled with god-power"), and their favor is sought by the people who really believe they have been specially gifted by their heathen deities.

Juggernaut, "the Lord of Life," though still worshipped, has no longer festivals of the sort that were common in India twenty-five years ago, especially in Calcutta. This hideous idol is six feet high, made of wood, painted blue, and usually seated upon a lofty car or chariot such as that seen in the illustration, and drawn by long ropes, held by thousands of fanatical followers. During the procession, a number of priests and priestesses usually stood on the car-platform, chanting the praises of their grim deity while he was taken to his country-house, a few miles distant from his temple. The people shouted, screamed, clapped their hands and made horrible discord with hundreds of instruments. It is a strange anomaly that, side by side with the cultured philosophy of the natives of Bengal, there should be found such a hideous and barbarous worship as that of Juggernaut, or of Kali the black goddess of Calcutta.

In the illustration showing peasants at dinner, the incident is taken from humble life in Ceylon. The husband, as head of the family, commands the respectful service of the wife, who not only places his meal before him, but waits by until he has eaten. The same social relation may be said to exist throughout India, if we except the status of women among the Parsees, the native converts to Christianity, and the Europeans and their descendants. Among the Parsees especially woman is honored as "the transmitter of life."

Mission to Sailors in Japan.

Within the last few weeks a new Mission or Seamen's Institute has been opened at Kobe, Japan. It is intended for the use of European and American sailors manning the large merchant fleets which now frequent Kobe harbor, the crews of which are exposed to great temptations at that growing port. At Yokohama, where the Seamen's Mission has had a chaplain and institute for many years, a steam launch has just been provided to carry the chaplain afloat day by day to minister to the crews on board their ships. The small European communities at both these ports find it somewhat difficult to furnish the requisite funds for these missions.

Sore Distress in Van.

A Cablegram from Dr. Kimball—Need of Further Relief Imperative—Aiding Poor Armenians in America.

ACCORDING to the advices received by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, there is no improvement in the situation of affairs in Van, Armenia, where the recent massacre took place. Dr. Grace N. Kimball, the well-known medical missionary and chief of the relief work at Van, has left that city and is now on her way home to this country. It will be remembered that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD two weeks ago, on first learning of the intention of Dr. Kimball to leave the field, cabled her offering a new guarantee of ten thousand dollars for the relief work, provided she remained in the field to superintend it. This offer was tendered under the impression that Dr. Kimball's retirement was due to discouragement and the lack of funds to carry on the relief work, which had been gradually diminishing as matters improved, but which the recent massacre and the widespread suffering that followed had made more necessary than ever. Every week before June 20, had witnessed a gradual improvement in the condition of the people, but the terrible slaughter which then took place, the destruction of homes and shops, and the wholesale pillaging of Armenians in Van and the surrounding country, had again plunged the Christian population of Van in misery and destitution.

Our cablegram to Dr. Kimball reached her at this juncture, when she was sick and discouraged in body and spirit, and her nerves overwrought by the scenes of bloodshed and the attention she had been obliged to bestow upon scores of wounded men, women, and children, gashed and mutilated by Turkish and Kurdish swords. For days the mission buildings had been both fortress and hospital, sheltering no less than 15,000 Armenian refugees at once. She no doubt felt her strength failing. Her grand courage had sustained her until the acute crisis of danger was past, and it was now imperative that she should withdraw from these scenes of excitement and rest awhile. So she decided to come home. Before leaving Van she cabled to Dr. Klopsch as follows:

To Klopsch, N. Y.:
I leave on 4th. Dr. Reynolds guarantees continuance of industrial relief work. Need is imperative, and we beg your assistance.
(Signed), KIMBALL.

From time to time, as opportunity offers, assistance will be rendered to the workers at Van, who are laboring so faithfully to protect and preserve the remnant of the persecuted Armenians. Any contributions for that purpose sent to this journal will be duly forwarded.

A number of our readers in different States have written us offering employment to such deserving Armenians as arrive in New York, having escaped from

THE CAR OF JUGGERNAUT.

Turkish tyranny, with the loss in many cases of their entire worldly possessions. We invite similar offers from other friends and shall be glad to place the writers in communication with worthy Armenians with a view to employment. Every week brings some of these refugees to our shores, thankful to escape the fate that has befallen their relatives and friends at home. To aid them by employment is a real charity, as it enables them to be self-supporting and also to help those in terrible need in Armenia. They are, for the most part, willing, capable and industrious young men.

The following contributions to the Armenian Relief Fund have been received during the week:

POOR MOTHERS BLESS MONT-LAWN!

It Brings Life and Health to the Sick Children of the Sweltering Tenements—A Season of Deadly Heat Increases the Sufferings of the City Poor.

DISEASE and death are exceedingly busy among the population of the tenements at this season. August has ushered in a period of intense heat, such as has not been experienced in the metropolis in recent years, and the suffering among the poor in the densely crowded district is unusually severe. Broiling by day, night finds the courts and alleys without a breath of air, and the miserable population vainly strive to escape the heat by leaving the suffocating quarters and passing the night on stoop, roof or fire escape. The greatest sufferers are the children, and death has made a wide swath in the ranks of the little unfortunates, these two weeks past. But poverty cannot escape its miseries, and amidst the hearts of those whom a kind Providence has blessed with the good things of life are touched with compassion enough to help the poor and the unfortunate, their condition must remain unaltered.

Scene of suffering of a kind all too common, was observed in an East Side street a few days ago. A poor family—father out of work and mother sick—had just been evicted, and their few pieces of wretched furniture had been thrown out on the sidewalk by a heartless landlord. Five or six little children, ragged and half-dressed, huddled about the poor mother who sat in picture of woe, the tears running down her thin cheeks as she looked at her children, now homeless. The father seemed to be stunned and sat by on a bundle of the bedding, mute and sullen. The little one not realizing their parents' misfortune clamored for bread, for they were hungry as well as naked. Here, if ever, was a case where the Free Air Fund could do Samaritan work. What a relief if the children of such unfortunate families could be taken to our Mont-Lawn Home for a time and there cleaned and fed and sheltered until the poor parents could be helped in some way to regain their home. Such cases are especially deserving, and many a mother has blessed the Children's Home and its generous patrons, for taking her helpless little ones out of the heat and misery and hunger and poverty of the tenements for a week or two among the woods and fields.

There can hardly be more striking contrast between the surroundings of many of our children at their own homes and after they reach Mont-Lawn. Every happy little one in this photograph comes from some home of poverty, and every child owes to some individual patron the pleasant outing he or she is now enjoying. Many of them speak of this. "Who was the kind lady who paid for me to come?" asked a wee, fair-haired tot of seven, with eyes as blue as the sky. "I'm going to say my prayers for her to-night, ma'am!" One lady in Massachusetts was asking the name and address of the young child this season. That number on the home register was opposite the name of Jennie Tierola, a little Japanese girl of seven, from lower New York, very sweet and affectionate, so her name was sent to the inquirer. Our photographer has given us a portrait of our bright little guest, who is no means the only foreigner in the home at present, although she is the only Japanese who has ever come there.

Every season the one thousandth arrival is looked forward to with interest by all the children, and is accorded a demonstrative welcome. This year the thousandth was Jacob Reinhardt, a real, typical New York tenement boy, who, despite poverty and the lack of many advantages enjoyed by more fortunate children, has in him the promise of a bright, successful man. He is frank and obedient, amiable to everybody and universally liked.

Very odd and amusing are some of the notions our children bring with them to Mont-Lawn. One child, evidently used to being fed with tea in the city, told the other children: "O, you don't have nothin' to drink in the country but milk, you don't." However, most of our children are greatly pleased with this good change in their drink, and all thrive astonishingly upon it.

Dr. Valentine, who visited the Home recently, gave the children an interesting talk upon how to enjoy themselves in the country, pointing out the variety of toys and playthings they could make for themselves from the great store of nature all about them, and the interesting collection of leaves and flowers they could gather; the bird and animal life they could watch and learn lessons from, etc. Many were stimulated to make some very good collections through the week. Dr. Klopsch offered prizes for the best collections of leaves or flowers.

Since the first opening of our Children's Home, in the summer of 1894, up to the present time, five thousand children from the very poorest and neediest sections of New York City have been our guests. Race and religion are not considered in making the selection; it is enough for the city missionaries and Christian workers who co-operate with us to know that the children are of the class to whom such an outing is a real blessing. To those good friends who, by their gifts and their prayers, have aided in carrying forward this Christ-like work among the waifs of the tenements and the slums, it is a grateful satisfaction to know that their generosity has saved many little lives and made these thousands of sad young hearts happy. A Card from the Editor.

August 11, 1896.

Most of the many interviews attributed to me on the Gold and Silver question have no foundation whatever in fact. I have a better way of saying what I think on public affairs than in an interview which may be twisted this way or that. The Lord Almighty alone knows what will be the decision of the ballot-box in November, but no one can make me believe that this country, which seems from the foundation of our institutions to have been under Divine protection, will be allowed, through the unwisdom of its friends, to go to ruin. Our best days are yet to come.

T. De Witt Talmage

Why Not a Christian?

VARRO, a Roman author, said he sent in many directions to find out from men what they thought to be the chief good. He received three hundred and twenty different replies; so many opinions were there in the world as to what was really the chief good to be sought after and the chief joy to be received. Blessed be God, we are not left to a wild guess upon this subject; but we have in the Bible a positive statement of the fact that the highest good and the gladdest joy of the soul is the service of God. The religion of Jesus Christ is compared in the Bible to the light; but it is brighter than that. It is compared to a rock; but it is firmer than that. And the Lord Jesus Christ, the great central force of that religion, is represented as a shepherd; but he is more careful than a shepherd. He is represented as a captain of salvation; but he is braver than any earthly officer. He is represented as the morning star heralding the day; but he is brighter and more glorious promise to the soul upon which he shines. Now, if all these things are true, why is it that the vast majority of men do not come and receive this Christ and accept this Gospel? Men act by the impulse of motives; so that if there are strong motives to induce them to turn from their idols to God, there must be some reason, either a good reason, or a bad reason.

In the first place, there are those who are kept back from the mission of the cross: they feel they are too young to come. They say: "We must live twenty or thirty years before we can reach God's mercy; there will be plenty of time to attend to these things. While we let us eat, drink, and be merry."

Are you too young to serve God? Yes, if you are too young to receive mercies at his hand; if you are too young to sit at the table of his bounty; if you are too young to be clothed by his goodness, to be fed by his love, to be sheltered by his benefaction, to be cared for by his loving-kindness—then you are too young. But the fact of your youth, instead of being the reason why you should stay away from Christ, is the very reason why you should come. Especial promise is given to you now that will never be given you again. Besides that, my young friends, are you not aware of the fact that if you put off the day of grace until the years of your youth have passed, in all probability you put it off forever? Do you not know that if you take up the church records in any religious organization the world over, you will find that the vast majority of those who find their way into the kingdom of Christ come in their early days? Do you not know that if a man allows twenty-five years of his life to pass without having found the peace and the hope of the Gospel, the strong probabilities are—twenty to one, one hundred to one—he will never find them? Do you not know that the day of youth is the especial day of God's mercy; that you cannot without infinite risk to your soul adjourn the matter; that it is far easier to come to Christ at five years of age than at ten, at ten than at fifteen, at fifteen than at twenty, at twenty than at twenty-five; and that if there are obstacles in the way now, they will multiply and augment until Alps are piled on Alps and Himalayas on Himalayas, and you will never scale the heights?

There are others who are kept back from the religious life because they are, as they say, afraid that they will not hold out. They say within themselves, or they say to me: "How if I should start heavenward and get discouraged, and stop and go back, how I would be derided, how I would abhor myself—starting for heaven and yet not getting there." My dear brother, you do not act in that way in other things. Suppose I could show you a financial operation by which you could make a thousand dollars, it would be almost certain that you could run it, but there might be a little risk—would you say: "My dear sir, I will not enter into the engagement. I might make only nine hundred dollars; indeed, there is a chance that I might not make anything. I admit that the probability is that I will make a thousand dollars; there are a thousand probabilities to one that I will; but that one keeps me from entering into the operation at all." No, you do not reason in that way. But when it is a question of treasures at God's right hand—eternal riches—escape from immortal bankruptcy, you come to a dead halt. Where are the most risks? Suppose there is a possibility that you should go back after starting heavenward, I ask you on which side are the most risks?

Battering-Rams.

THE editor of this paper received the following letter. It is mightily suggestive and must be answered: Suppose you were a young minister, with only a common education, and only a partial preparation for the work, with some little what we call "Western grit," which means energy and sincerity and enthusiasm. And suppose everywhere you preached, scores of souls, old and young, were brought to the blessed Jesus. And suppose just near where you were conducting a revival meeting there should be a brother minister in charge of a church, a very wise ex-Presiding Elder, one of the stiff, self-esteeming, self-exalting lords over God's heritage, and I suppose he should sit at home with his feet on a throne of your meeting where souls are coming to Jesus by the score every night, and never come near. And then after you had closed the meeting and had preached nothing but Jesus, he should come at you and your church and say as they say out here, "I am at a gate-post," and as far as he could see, butt you out of existence, as Jesus said, and then turn and go over the hill, and butt them terribly, because they went over there to meeting. And suppose, as a result, a good share of his flock should come into your flock on profession of faith, would you receive them?

And further: Suppose you should go on preaching Jesus and him crucified, clubbing no sect or denomination, and sinners were converted continually; and this ecclesiastic ram should continue to butt at you, would you turn and butt him, or would you go on preaching Christ and let him alone until he had butted his whole congregation into yours?

A SUBSCRIBER.

Our advice is to make it as easy for the ex-Presiding Elder as possible. Make a soft place for him to butt against. He cannot help it. Probably somebody once butted against him, and he is only "making change" for what was once given him. Perhaps his wife keeps him awake nights with curtain-lectures. There must be something the matter. Probably if your liver and spleen were as much out of order as his are, you would butt against his fence as hard as he butts against yours. We apologize for him. We once had four or five rams with their heads down going for our gate-post as violently as he goes for yours. It is a case for sympathy; for we heard of one such case, where an unwise ram of the flock persisting in its rage butted against a stone wall until its fore-quarters were all gone, and kept on butting until its hind-quarters were gone, and not satisfied still kept on butting until the farmer in the morning found nothing left of the unfortunate ram except the tip end of its last extremity. Remember, my suffering correspondent, that it is worse for the one who butts than for the one that gets butted.

What Whisky Can Do.

A FRIEND of temperance puts upon our table an advertising card from a restaurant in Philadelphia. It proposes to regale and refresh the people in the "City of Brotherly Love." The liquor shop thus advertised is very near Independence Hall, and persons visiting that patriotic spot can take it in their excursion if they are very dry. It is well for those people who never drink, to understand what privileges they miss, and also what philanthropists the rum-sellers really are.

Suing a Demijohn.

A PECULIAR breach of promise suit was brought in Manchester, England. A maiden appeals to the court for damages, now that a certain innkeeper refuses to take her in marriage after encouraging her to hope. It is proved that he had the delirium tremens in her house several times. She gets a verdict of ten pounds. Why any woman wants to marry the delirium tremens we know not. She deserves congratulation at escape from such a man, instead of ten pounds for the loss of him. No woman can afford to take a man if she has to have delirium tremens thrown into the bargain. A man is very well, but better no man at all than such an accompaniment. Let women be cautious how they marry men with highly-spiced breath, the spice put in to hide whiskey odor. Better pay ten pounds to get rid of him than sue him for ten pounds because he does not marry you. If a man makes for himself unhappy connubial relations, he may run away and so get rid of it, but for a woman wrongly affianced there is no escape. The young man may have glossy hair and bright eyes and immaculate broadcloth; but if he drinks, even moderately, make up your mind that before thirty-five he will do one of two things—either stop drinking entirely or else go to perdition, and if he does the latter he will probably take his wretched wife along with him.

BRIEF NOTES.

Ex-Queen Lilliuokalani, of Hawaii, is recently baptized and confirmed by the Bishop of Honolulu, Dr. Wilks.

There are, according to a recent statement, 25,710 members of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in the British army and navy.

Herr Theodor Ippen, a Jew, has been appointed consul at Jerusalem by the Austrian Government. This is the first time has thus represented a European Power.

Evangelist Parker Has Just Closed Series of meetings at South End, Oklahoma. The audience was large, and a large number of conversions.

The Statistics of the German Baptist again show steady growth, the membership last year being 25,848—an increase of 1,000 over 1900 churches in Germany, and 100 in the United States.

The Indian Associations of San Francisco and San Jose have engaged a Congregationalist for labor among the Indians in those cities for six months at a moderate salary. He is encouraged in his work.

In India there are 100,000 Boys and girls, under the age of fourteen, who are married, while 8,000 boys and 24,000 girls have not attained the age of four, and are age bonds as arranged by their parents.

A Number of Christian Young Men of Brooklyn, N. Y., have formed a League to organize the lower section of the city, where poverty and vice is rampant. They will hold meetings, to begin with, on Atlantic Avenue near the river and will organize a Sunday School.

Christians and Mohammedans have a common object in Africa. Bishop Tugwell learned that gin has been getting into the country, and he called a meeting to protest against it. About 100 Mohammedans were present, most of whom were strong in their desire to maintain the prohibition of the traffic.

The Services Held at Victor, Colorado. Evangelist H. W. Rankin was blessed to a number of conversions. Before the beginning of the meetings there were sixteen prostitutes in one in a town notoriously wicked, would be crowded every night.

As One Testimony to the Rapid Growth of the Palestinian population, it is stated on good authority that while ten years ago there were only 12,000 Jews in Jaffa, to-day there are 42,000. All the square miles of land in Palestine have passed into the possession of the Jews for agricultural purposes in the last twenty-five years.

A Recent Census of Church Attendance. Newcastle, Eng., showed that in the last fifty years the population has increased 147 per cent. Church attendance has increased only 12 per cent. The denominations represented in the census increased from seventeen to twenty-five, but not more than one person in ten attends church.

Recent Reports from Africa Show that two hundred miles east, south and west from Congo, on the Upper Nile, the country is open to the Gospel, for the north, for seventy hundred miles, it is open. Bishop Tucker has twelve hundred natives of Uganda into the country since October last.

Commander Ballington Booth in Answer to the question of the points in which the Salvation Army differs from the Salvation Army, mentions other important matters, that the converts are not only encouraged to join churches, but that all property is in the hands of trustees not head of the Army.

All Friends of Temperance will be glad to see the statement of the Congregationalist that first time in the history of the White Mountain Indians of any kind are sold this side of the bars of any of the hotels, small as it is, a convincing proof of the energy with which the New Hampshire authorities are enforcing Prohibition laws.

The Correspondent of a New York Journal who attended the Christian Endeavor Convention at Washington, made an estimate of the cost of the Society and the Washington friends and delegates in traveling expenses. His estimate is based on personal inquiries and is believed to be nearly accurate. The total is nearly a million and a half dollars.

The Collection for Foreign Missions at the Christian Alliance Convention at Old Orchard on August 9, was phenomenal. Rev. A. B. S. delivered a stirring address and the collection taken up. The gifts included, besides the gold watches, bicycles, gold rings, jewels, a hundred and twenty shares of stock. The total value of the gifts is $101,324. Ten thousand persons were present.

The Committee Appointed by the Religious Assembly to report on the advisability of retaining the new building erected in Fifth Avenue, New York, have it is understood agreed on the point and will advise the building being retained and a special effort being made to reduce the cost and Foreign Boards of the burden of their which curtails their usefulness. Ex-President Benson, ex-Governor Beaver, and ex-Postmaster General Wanamaker were members of the Committee.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson, the Leader of the prohibition movement in England has discovered evasion of the law in an unexpected place. The Government has been prompt in instituting proceedings against any person selling liquor out of a house, no one has noticed that in the room of the House of Commons which has long been supplied, Sir Wilfrid Lawson proposes to test the courts the question whether the Government has the right to break laws it is appointed to execute.

An Anti-Opium Agitation is Now Going on in Japan. The Japanese are seriously alarmed the habit of opium smoking should reach their shores from the newly-acquired island of Formosa where it has long been widely practiced. The Japanese Government has issued a proclamation bringing into force the Japanese law which strictly prohibits the sale of opium, except for medicinal use, but making an exception in favor of Formosans, who, having already acquired the habit, should obtain certificates enabling them to obtain accustomed supply.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

News of Pharaoh.

LIKE a voice from the long-buried past is the inscription on the stone recently found at Thebes by Prof. Flinders Petrie. It is the story of certain successful campaigns inscribed by Merenptah, who is generally believed to be the Pharaoh who refused to let Israel go and who endured the plagues. The most interesting fact in the inscription for Bible students, is that it contains the only reference to Israel found on the monuments of Egypt. Petrie relates in the Century Magazine how he found the stone. It appears that after he obtained permission to explore a desert which was the site of ancient Thebes. It was thickly strewn with chips to a considerable depth and was deemed an uninviting field for miners. Prof. Petrie removed the chips in several places and at last uncovered a beautiful slab of black granite, or more especially, syenite. It was over ten feet high, five feet wide, and thirteen inches thick, and its face was brilliantly polished, as lustrous as a mirror. On its upper side was an inscription of three thousand characters by the most sumptuous of Egypt's kings, Amenhotep III., who is believed to have reigned about fifteen hundred years before Christ. It related to his offerings to his God, Amen, and was unimportant. But when the slab was raised, it was found that a much more valuable inscription of about equal length was on its reverse side. Merenptah had covered the beautiful stone, had turned it over, and caused an inscription of his own to be made on its vacant back. He had built it into the wall of the temple at Thebes, and the inscription of his predecessor in turn and his own inscription exposed. At the overthrow of the temple the stone fell without breaking and Merenptah's inscription has thus been preserved with its face to the earth for nearly three thousand years. It has thus been protected from the ravages of wind and water, and its colors are fresh and the inscriptions sharp and clear. The stone was photographed before its removal and portions of the photograph are reproduced in the illustration on this page. The king's record is boastful, as is usual in such inscriptions. He says that he has subdued all his enemies. He mentions them by name and Israel is among them. The king says that he had "spoiled the people of Israel," and had left them without seed. He does not enter into further detail. Whether the king is referring to his oppression of the people, or to the pursuit to the Red Sea, in which case he is misrepresenting the facts, or to some other later campaign of which the Bible has no record, is unknown. The significant fact is that he evidently knew the people by their name of Israel. But his boast was vain. His proud dynasty have passed into oblivion, and the people whom he declared he had left without seed still survive and will yet be the leaders of the nations according to God's promise.

Copy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O Lord? Thy enemies shall be found liars unto thee and thou shalt tread on their high places. (Deut. 33: 29.)

Said by an Evil Reputation.

The recently published diary of a famous lawyer contains the record of a remarkable case which was tried in the early years of this century. The defendant was charged with obtaining money on false pretences. The chief witness against him was a man whom he had defrauded of a large sum of money. He denounced him on the stand as a liar, a trickster, a man utterly devoid of integrity and principle. The defendant's lawyer said that was not the character before in Wall Street and among business men. But the witness contradicted him. He declared that all his associates knew him to be untruthful and dishonest. A man whom it was unsafe to trust. The witness had been almost ruined by him and he used the strongest language in describing his villainy. The lawyer, finding that this evidence was corroborated on all hands by witnesses whom his client had defrauded and who were anxious to have him severely punished, ingeniously used his bad character as a basis of defence. He contended that so bad a man could not be guilty of obtaining money on false pretences. That the man who could do that successfully must be a man of good character, who was trusted and respected. By their own admission, the witnesses had bark when she was three days out. The weather had been very heavy with high seas. A signal was flying from the bark's mast denoting that it was sinking and asking help. It was a dangerous business to attempt to reach her, but the French captain had two boats lowered. They succeeded in reaching the bark and called to the crew to lower themselves by ropes. But the bark had a stout boat left and this was filled and pulled to the steamer. The captain and three men were still left on the bark. They waited nearly an hour for a favorable opportunity of getting on board the steamer's boats. Finding that the vessel was liable to sink at any moment, as it was leaking fast and there were ten feet of water in the hold, the men jumped one at a time and were caught and lifted into the boats, the captain being the last to leave. All were carried safely on board the steamer and brought to port. If men who are in danger of eternal death were similarly anxious to be saved there would be less difficulty than there is in in-out of the harem and educated. He took the name of The Bab, or gate, and his followers were called Babists. The Shah of his day favored him, but the nobles hated and opposed him. When Nasr-ed-Din, the late Shah came to the throne, he began a fierce persecution of the Babists. He put the Bab himself to death, and sent hundreds of his followers to prison, and torture. The persecuted sect became a secret order and its numbers rapidly increased. Among them was a fanatic of unbalanced mind, who brooded on the cruel executions of the best men and women in Persia until he became possessed of the conviction that whosoever put the Shah to death would do God service. This statement indicates that the Shah's death was a retribution for his own cruelty:

His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate. (Ps. 7: 16.)

Admitted Imprisonment.

In the course of a trial, reported by a Pittsburgh journal, a witness was on the stand who gave important evidence which appeared decisive on the question at issue. The opposing lawyer, who is noted for his skill in cross-examination, was anxious to break the force of his testimony. He tried to confuse him as to places and dates, but the witness kept his self-possession and told a straight story. As a final thrust he asked him the insulting question whether he had ever been in prison. To the surprise of every one in court, and to the intense delight of the lawyer, the witness admitted that he had been imprisoned, but it was many years ago. This opportunity of discrediting an important witness was too good to be missed, and the lawyer dexterously framed his questions to impress the jury with the folly of relying on the evidence of a "jail-bird." How long a term had he served? He had been in prison eighteen months. In what prison had he been confined? The answer was given modestly, but it completely demolished the lawyer's purpose. The witness said it was at Andersonville. That name was enough to show there was no disgrace, but rather honor, in his imprisonment. So the time will come when those who have endured reproach and poverty for the sake of Christ and the principles of his religion, will be honored and their sufferings will be a glory to them.

Our light affliction which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. (II. Cor. 4: 17.)

Regrowth of the Brain.

An astonishing discovery is reported to have been made by a physician in Paris. It is that the brain has the power of self-reproduction. If a man's finger be cut off no one expects to see a new finger grow in its place, or if his eye is removed no one expects to see a new eye grow in its socket, but according to Dr. Vitzou, if a portion of the brain be taken away, the remaining cells put forth their power to replace the part that is missing. Dr. Vitzou made the discovery through experiment. One of his patients whose brain was injured, and who was believed to be permanently incapacitated, unexpectedly recovered. The physician was so much surprised that he determined to investigate further. He obtained two monkeys and removed from them that portion of the brain which receives visual impressions. They were then totally blind. They had the eye and the optic nerve but the part of the brain that received the impressions of the organ being taken away, they were as blind as if their eyes had been put out. They remained blind for several weeks but afterwards it was evident that they were recovering sight. Gradually they regained their power and were eventually able to see as well as at first. Dr. Vitzou then opened their skulls and found that there had been a new growth of the brain and the missing part had been replaced. Dr. Vitzou thinks that if the brain of the monkey can do this the human brain has the same power. The discovery, if it proves true, is one of great importance, as it holds out hope in many cases which have hitherto been regarded as hopeless. If the brain has the power of self-development it is the only organ of the body that has it. As to the heart, we know that God alone can give a new heart.

A new heart will I give you and a new spirit will I put within you: and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. (Ezek. 36: 26.)

supplied money to a man notoriously unprincipled and therefore must have been aware of the risk, as his client could not have deceived them. They were, therefore, partners with him and there had been no false pretence. The judge took the same view of the case and the prisoner was acquitted. He was one of the few men who have been saved from prison by their bad character. Many a man has found eternal salvation in a similar way. The most difficult of all men to win to Christ are men of good moral character, who do not realize their need of a Saviour. The man who knows himself to be a sinner and is aware that he has no merits of his own to plead, is often willing to trust to Christ as his only hope.

The publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. (Matt. 21: 31.)

A Rescue at Sea.

The French steamer, La Bourgogne, which arrived at New York on Aug. 5 brought to port the crew of a German bark rescued in mid-ocean. The French liner saw the ducing them to cast themselves into the arms of Jesus trusting him to save them.

I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. (John 10: 28.)

The Murderer of the Shah.

A new light on the cause of the recent murder of the Shah of Persia is obtained from a communication to the New York Sun. From this statement, we learn that the assassin was a member of a sect known as Babists. This sect dates from the preaching of an enthusiastic young Mohammedan, named Ali Mohammed who, about fifty years ago, returned from a pilgrimage to Mecca and began preaching in Persia. He was a radical reformer and a man of wonderful eloquence. He declared that the true follower of Mohammed ought to apply the spirit of the Prophet to the problems of the time; that evils such as polygamy, which the Prophet did not denounce in his day should be extirpated on his principles; and that woman ought to be taken Marriages in Java.

A Country Where the Wedding Ceremony is Peculiarly Fantastic and Picturesque.

It has been frequently remarked by travelers in the East that there are three all-important episodes in a woman's life: her betrothal, her wedding, and her funeral. This might be said of all countries where marriage is a recognized institution. In some, however, so much importance is attached to the event of the wedding, that it easily overshadows all the other affairs of feminine life. This is especially the case in India, Persia, China, and Java.

Some time ago, an artist correspondent of the London Illustrated News, while traveling between Malang and Kadoe, in the midland provinces of Java, encountered the queer-looking procession shown in the illustration on this page. It did not take long for him to learn that it was a wedding-procession, and that it was all the more unusual one from the fact that the bride, who does not ordinarily appear in public on such occasions, was present. Very odd, indeed, was the dress of the bridegroom. His black hair hung loosely down his back, and a gilt crown of curious workmanship adorned his head. As far as the waist, his face and body had been colored yellow by the use of some pigments, and the skin had been powdered with rice or arrow-root flour. Large plates of beaten gold hung from his neck and lay on his breast. From the waist downward depended an ample skirt or sarong of silk.

His brilliant attire was, however, fairly rivalled by that of the bride, who was seated in a sort of arm-chair or garuda, as the conveyance is called by the Javanese. The chair was made of cane, heavily gilt and covered with cloth of gold, and was carried by four men. Like the groom, she, too, wore a crown, and her hair came to a point above the forehead, and was tied at the back into a sort of knot or conday. Her not unprepossessing face was painted and powdered, and from breast to waist she wore a corset of steel, while the rest was covered with a rich silk sarong that reached almost to the ground. So novel a procession, with such abundance of rich display, naturally attracted much attention, even in a country where these are by no means uncommon.

Java is one of the pleasantest and most salubrious of tropical countries. Except in some marshy districts in the northern plains, the climate is healthy and the heat not intense. Of the 22,000,000 population probably 50,000 are European, and a quarter are of African descent. Agriculture is the chief occupation of the people, rice, coffee and sugar being the main products. Java is believed to have received some degree of civilization from India in early ages and also its first religion—Buddhism. When the Hindu dynasty was overthrown in the fifteenth century the Mohammedans introduced their faith and to-day Islam is the predominant religion, although the system is interwoven with original spirit worship and with much that belongs to the worship of Buddha and Brahma. The Javanese try to propitiate spirits for the cure of diseases and they believe that all influences for good or evil emanate from the stars.

Christianity has secured a good foothold in the country and the religion of Christ is spreading. Mission work is car-

Concerning "Home-bodies."

"Home bodies," as distinguished from those people who love to go gadding about and constantly visiting their neighbors, are certainly more desirable as acquaintances. Yet it is possible to overdo the staying at home. "My wife is such a home-body," is the familiar expression used by many a man who desires to say something pleasant of his life's partner; but the poor stay-at-home would very likely be better pleased if it were recognized that she is not quite so much of a fixture by the fireside. "Oh, mother never goes anywhere," remarks a daughter, in an off-hand way, that shows how little importance she attaches to the statement. Why should a mother, whose heart and hands are still young enough to enjoy the innocent pleasures of life, be set wholly aside and lost sight of in all arrangements for recreation?

We know it is quite the usual thing to praise the "home-body," and to speak of her as though her indisposition to go abroad were her chiefest charm. Yet we cannot but feel that such a view of a woman's life is narrow and selfish on the part of those who adopt it. True, it is the duty of mothers and daughters to sweeten the home and make it attractive, but in doing this, let us not make it a prison for them. In these days, there are a thousand demands upon woman's time and energies, and to limit the sphere of her usefulness and confine her almost exclusively to the home precincts, which she must decorate and adorn for the delectation of the sterner sex, is to apply, in a greatly modified way of course, the same principle of masculine domination that limited woman's possibilities in earlier days. Yet there always will be enough home-bodies—voluntarily so—to keep up the dear old traditions of the hearth.

"Helping Somewhere."

"Is your father at home?" was asked of a small child on a village doctor's doorstep. "No," he said, "he's away." "Where do you think I could find him?" "Well," he said, with a considering air, "you've got to look for some place where Life's Evening.

SO fades the day—above the western
So fades the day.
I see the glory of its crimson change
To mauve and grey.
The hills grow indistinct unto my sight
Pale lightnings flash upon the edge of night
So fades the day.
When noon was here—I was so flushed
When noon was here,
I longed in vain to find one green retreat
One crystal clear
Draught of cool water; but 'neath torrid
I found no shade, and every creek was
When noon was here.
I am so tired—the way was long and stony
So tired am I.
Across the sky.
I feared night once, but I have with the Lesson of a Wasted Life.

ON Sept. 30, 1863, there died in the town of Alsace, an idiotic woman. She was an object of ridicule to those who knew her story, whose one crowning moment of sane excitement she was never tired of mumbling an account of to her village. For this woman was the very one who had been the godless mob, in the days of the French Revolution, had elevated her to be their "Goddess of Reason." On that day, she sat on the altar of Notre Dame, in white robes, ornamented with a mantle and holding a scepter in her hand. The mob had mocked at her and there she had been hailed as the deity who was to deem France free from errors and distress. What a pathetic commentary on the vanity of sin was seen in the beggar woman's blind, idiotic, dying wail and in the nearly seventy years afterwards. What a spectacle of the vengeance of history those who set themselves against the cause of Christ is still too true to them who fall on the stone cut out for the corner shall be broken, but they whom it shall be ground to powder.

Royalty's Home.

Much attention being directed, both

England and on the Continent, to the domestic life of the Danish Court, which has figured so largely in recent royal marriages. The favorite home of the Danish princes is not at Copenhagen, beautiful though the Amalienborg Palace and the Senborg Castle are. The favorite home is Charlottenlund, where the young people enjoy plenty of outdoor sports. They are all energetic bicyclists, and are constantly to be met in summer-time speeding over the roads to visit their grandpapa at Bernstorff, or to take a run into Copenhagen. Charlottenlund is only a few miles from the Danish capital, and is a picturesque residence. The grounds are beautifully timbered, while the house, lying close to a large deer forest, forms an ideal residence for hot weather. A pleasant breeze comes from the Sound close as the Crown Prince and Princess and their children sit under the shade of fine beeches and elms of their garden in perfect seclusion.

My Little One.

God bless my little one! how fair
The mellow lamplight gilds his hair.
Loose on the cradle-pillow there,
God bless my little one!
God love my little one! as clear,
Cool sunshine holds the first green year.
On April meadows, hold him dear.
God love my little one!

Keeping the House Cool.

The question comes up every summer, how shall we best keep our homes cool during the sultry part of the day? Shall we close them and shut out the heat, or simply darken them and allow the air to come in? My way, says a writer in The Home Magazine, has been to open every window, both at the top and at the bottom, early in the morning, flooding the house with the sweet cool air. Then, about ten o'clock, or earlier, close the windows, except for a few inches at the bottom and fasten shutters and blinds so they will not fly open. Darken every room which you are not using until the sun goes down. But do not sit to read, sew, or practice in the dark. Your eyes need plenty of light.

Heaven.

uggestions on the Christian Endeavor
for the Week Beginning August 30.
Re 21: 1-7, 22-27.

LN ways more or less vague most people believe in the existence of heaven. Even savage tribes hold the belief, though their idea is generally that of a magnified or clarified earth. A popular writer recently argued that there is no scientific basis for a belief in a future life, but science admits that science does not presently deal with what is seen and exhaust the question. It deals with what is seen and to be handled or examined; that heaven is outside of our domain. Our vision does not reveal to us all existing things, or enable us to say anything approach to confidence that a thing or a place has never been seen, does not exist. The telescope on the one hand and the microscope on the other prove that the universe contains much beyond the aided power of sight. The hints, too, that the instruments do not comprehend the aids we may eventually get to our sight. The X-ray rays are a suggestion that there may be things found yet for further mention of the senses into which we are excluded. It would, therefore, be rash on the part of a scientist to declare that there is no scientific idea of the existence of heaven, that consequently it does not exist. But heaven is really a matter of faith rather than of reason. We believe in it because its existence is revealed to us, and our faith confirmed by our spiritual experience, and by the certainties of our present life. For we are driven to the last resort we have still the argument left, that if the Christian's hope is based on all life ends in annihilation, he will not be content of disappointment, but if he proves to be right, the condition of those who have entered the future life must be one of conscious misery. It is strange that so little is said to us about heaven. The Christian religion stands alone in this peculiarity, but it is not a defect. The conceptions of heaven in other religions are so widely the work of human imagination as to be entirely valueless. Heaven, as they describe it, is merely the idea they have of supreme felicity. Even the description in Revelation started with the writer's mind. A land in which the trees are of gold, and there are jewels large enough to be the foundations of walls are the writer's notions of extreme delight. Whatever John saw on the shores of Patmos, as described in human imagination, and the figures are doubtless symbols of glory, which was, as Paul asserts, indescribable. But there were other characteristics of his description that appeal to others besides those who chief desire is for gold and jewels. These are negatives, and they are negative of our chief ills. John observed that there was no death, no pain, no sorrow, and that all tears were wiped away. Such a place must be heaven, indeed. But the most important revelation he has to give is of the conditions of entrance. Heaven is for overcomers. Those who resist the evil around them and within them will inherit heaven. They will be fit for it having proved their capacity for its enjoyments. This is the corollary of Christ's own saying, The kingdom of heaven is within you. Those who are living on the earthly principles, whose desires are for greater purity, will enter there.

A Prayer.

Suggested by Francis Ridley Havergal.

MASTER: this my prayer to thee;
Let me now and ever be Thine, where'er thou leadest me.
Be the duty great or small,
O, be with me, lest I fail!
Help me, Lord, thy will to do;
Teach me what is good and true,
No ill from my life accrue.
Chasten me, till I become Fit to meet with thee, at home.
Precious Saviour, in thy love,
Teach me sweetness, and above
All, a perfect trust in thee.
Make my faith in Calvary,
Strong and sure and sweet and pure,
Through all trials to endure.

—N. E. WOODHOUSE.

In Service.

MAKE use of me, my God,
Let me not be forgot,
A broken vessel, cast aside,
One whom thou needest not.
I am thy creature, Lord,
And made by hands Divine,
And I am part, however mean,
Of this great world of thine.
Thou usest all thy works;
The weakest things that be,
Each has a service of its own,
For all things wait on thee.
Thou usest the high stars,
The tiny drops of dew,
The giant peak and the little hill—
My God, O use me, too.

Christ's Own Prophecies.

The Course of the Church's History Between the First and Second Appearances.
BY REV. GEO. H. PEMBER, M.A.*

BESIDES other revelations in the New Testament, there are two great prophecies from the mouth of Christ himself, the interpretation of which appears to intimate that the acceptable year of the Lord is almost ended. These prophecies are the Seven Parables in the chapter of Matthew, and the Seven Epistles in the second and third chapters of the Apocalypse.

The number of Parables and of Epistles is seven, that number being significant of dispensational completeness; and, in each of the two prophecies, we apparently have set before us seven successive phases, or characteristic epochs, of the Church, which embrace the whole of her career on earth. These epochs commence in the order in which they are given; but any of them may overlap that which succeeds it or even extend its influence, in a greater or less degree, to the end of the age.

These parables related in Matt. 13 are a revelation of a new order of things then about to be brought in. For, on the one hand, they relate the repeated offers of the kingdom to the Jews, the proclamation of its laws by the King, and the exhibition of his marvelous credentials; on the other, the ever-increasing hatred of the Jewish leaders, and their refusal to recognize the Lord's authority—a refusal prompted by so bitter a spirit that, when they are unable to deny his mighty works, they even dare to accuse him of doing them by the aid of infernal power. By this blasphemous assertion their true condition is revealed; and, at the end of the twelfth chapter, the Lord intimates that they are about to be rejected of God and delivered into the hands of Satan for a season. A crisis in the history of the nation had arrived, similar in some points to the time when Jerusalem was given up to Nebuchadnezzar, but involving a far deeper degradation.

For the earlier chastisement merely deprived the Jews for awhile of the right to be "the Kings of the Earth upon the earth." God still retained them as his people, though he sent them into captivity, and caused them to be bound in affliction and iron. Consequently it was only necessary to appoint temporary world-rulers, until the kingdom could be restored to Israel; and this was done by the transfer of the sovereignty to the Gentiles. And, since the secret of the Lord is always revealed to them that fear him, his purposes in regard to the change were disclosed to the godly Jews by the pen of Daniel.

Such were the circumstances connected with the assumption of supremacy by Nebuchadnezzar, and the plan of the Gospel of Matthew is in strict analogy with them. But, in this second crisis, the Jews, by the rejection and murder of the son of God, brought upon themselves a far more grievous punishment than the mere loss of their earthly dominion; for the covenant of Jehovah was now altogether suspended, and they were no longer recognized as his people. Yet it was necessary, during the interval which followed, that some witnesses should be chosen to maintain a testimony for him upon the earth.

CHAPTER IV.

By SEYMOUR AND MILTON.

PLEASANT as were the recollections of the picnic in Brookdale, Widow Seymour, to whom its success was chiefly due, could not think of it without some little uneasiness. She had been grieved about the boyish fight in which her son, Milton, had engaged, and had been vexed by his conversing with the low Irish boys, and she was mortified as she thought of that hysterical seizure which came upon her when she awoke from her nap in the wood. She wondered what Mr. Walter must have thought at seeing his little daughter's staid Sunday School teacher start up screaming in that senseless way. She would like very much to know what he said about it, for she felt painfully embarrassed at the thought of meeting him again.

Carrie, with childlike simplicity relieved her mind on the last question the next Sunday after the picnic.

"Are you well, teacher?" she asked. "Papa told me to be sure I asked you, for he thought you must be sick by the way you screamed that day in the wood."

"Oh, yes, quite well, thank you, Carrie," said Mrs. Seymour. "I was not sick, only a little tired and excited by the picnic. I fell asleep and had a distressing dream. I suppose it did look rather strange my being so agitated."

"Papa thought you must be sick. He was looking at you while you were asleep and was saying how you were like my dead Mamma and just then you started up with that scream. I will tell him you are quite well, he will be glad to know."

It was satisfactory to learn that Mr. Walter's impression of the incident had been one of only kindly concern, and Mrs. Seymour now felt she could meet him without embarrassment. She hoped that the other disagreeable incidents might have an equally satisfactory ending. But one of them was destined to give her trouble.

The Irish boys finding that Milton and George Browne did not come over to see them, were not disposed to let the acquaintance drop. They paid a visit to Brookdale one Sunday and easily found the school identified with the picnic. They lay down on the grass outside the school and waited for the appearance of their two acquaintances. Unfortunately, it happened that Mrs. Seymour was not at school that afternoon, being detained at home by a severe headache. Milton consequently went to school alone and upon the way came upon the two lads and returned their effusive greeting. George Browne came along a few moments later and presently about a dozen of the smaller boys of the school joined the group. In spite of his mother's warning, Milton was fascinated by the talk of the Irish lads. They could tell funny stories, and as they had lived for some time in the slums of New York before their fathers moved into the country to work on the new contract, they had seen more of city life than Milton and the other boys had ever heard before. School was forgotten, while the country lads listened to stories about "cops" and the fun that was to be had playing around the big buildings. The stories were interlarded with slang and profanity, but the Sunday School boys thought this was an evidence of manliness. Presently the two boys intimated that they were hungry and that some kind of hospitality would be appreciated.

George Browne was fond of good food, and plenty of it, and this appeal touched him in a tender place; so, dropping the argument, he consulted with Seymour about the best way to get the lads something to eat. As to taking them to their homes, that would end in a separation, and be fatal to their hopes of an afternoon of real pleasure. As all the shops were closed, they finally agreed to go to old Mrs. Sheridan, and try to get some bread and milk. They soon reached her painless cottage, but before entering they heard her voice engaged in prayer, especially for her son, whom she spoke of in her petition as "my Johnny." She poured out her agonized spirit for Johnny's reformation from intemperance, and for his conversion to God.

When she had closed her prayer "for Jesus' sake, Amen," the boys entered, and George Browne spoke:

"We came to see if you would sell us some bread and milk, Mrs. Sheridan."

"Not on the holy Sabbath, my boys. Who wants the food? and tell me why you were not at school this afternoon?"

This latter question was addressed to Milton, who at first blushed and looked at the other boys; but when he saw their winks and grimaces, he became bolder, and, with a broad smile replied:

"Why, you see, Granny Sheridan, we have been doing missionary work for the school, and have got two recruits for Deacon Slowfoot;" whereupon the two Irish boys bowed, took off their caps, scraped their feet, and said:

"At your service, mum."

Mrs. Sheridan looked sharply at the strangers, and at the other boys, and did not know exactly how to take it, but she replied: "There is some bread and milk in the cellar, honeys; and there are some berries Mrs. Seymour was kind enough to send me—God bless her. You step down and get them, and you are welcome to them for the hungry lads. The Irish boys did not hesitate long in gulping down the old lady's stock of milk and berries, and made a raid upon the bread-box. In half an hour they were all sitting outside of Mr. Walter's garden-wall, listening to Mullin tell some of his wondrous adventures and hair's-breadth escapes; and the afternoon passed rapidly away.

Presently Mullin threw his cap up into the air and said, "This be'n't no fun at all, at all; I go in for a good old time when I am out on a spree. Ain't some rich old man about here got more apples than he can eat; there's no harm, me b'ys, in bagging a few apples. Thin we'll be about ready to quit, and how's O'Rourke and me to get home? Ain't none of yese big bugs got a horse and buggy to drive us over? What's the use of carryin' watches, and livin' in big houses, if ye can't entertain your friends like gentlemen?"

Again Browne and Seymour exchanged glances. Both admired their new-found friends, but neither dare take them home, either for supper or lodging. There was silence for awhile, when George Browne spoke, after an apparent struggle with his conscience:

"I say, Seymour, would Uncle Walter miss a few apples? They hang on his trees as thick as hops. And could not we borrow his big brown mare and drive these fellows over to Chestnut Hill?"

"Bully for yese. Hurrah for Browne!" said the Irish boys, highly delighted both with the prospect of apples and the ride home.

"How borrow? Speak out Browne," asked Seymour, his conscience hardening under surrounding influences.

"Why, just unlatch the stable door, and take out the old mare and hitch her up to the buckboard. Uncle Walter has often let me drive her. He will never be the wiser, and we will not hurt the mare, and return her when we get back; besides, some time I will tell him all about it," replied Browne.

Seymour did not like the project, but as the Irish boys must be got rid of somehow perhaps George Browne's plan was as good as could be devised. There was some risk in it, but the tales they had been listening to had put them in the humor for adventure. Milton, therefore, made no objection. Neither he nor Browne would take any part in robbing the orchard, but their new friends did not care about that. All they needed was for someone to show them the way to the orchard. It took but a few minutes to set a watch, and agree upon a signal of danger, while they stole the apples, and in a very short time the boys returned with pockets and hats full of fruit.

Both Milton and George were uneasy. They wished they had never seen the boys. Their talk had lost its charm and they were conscious of being lowered by the association. To see them munching the stolen apples was irritating and their deliberation kept them in an agony of fear of discovery. At last to their relief Mullins declared it was time to quit, and if Browne meant to keep his word and act the gentleman he had better fetch around that mare and buggy.

Browne started at once. He knew how to get into the stable where he had played on many holiday. It was far enough from the house for the mare's shoes not to be heard on the gravel and he calculated on being easily able to get away without the knowledge of any one in his uncle's house.

Milton was left alone with the two Irish boys, and he was eagerly waiting the coming of Browne with the mare, when Mullins sprang a fresh humiliation on him.

"See here, you Seymour," he said, "you've got to help us in a little job. O'Rourke and me found a melon patch at the bottom of the orchard, and we cut a few to eat on the way home. You've got to come with us and help us carry them out here. One trip for the three of us will do it better than two trips for two."

Milton hated to do it, but as it would quicken the departure of the boys, he agreed, and accompanied them through the orchard.

The melons were soon found and the boys with one under each arm made their way cautiously and noiselessly through the orchard to the wall, on the other side of which Browne would be waiting with the mare and buggy. The two strangers went first, and Mullins had scaled the wall when a step was heard and a man was seen coming through the orchard from the house. O'Rourke crept close to the wall, stooping low and Milton trembling with fear halted under the shadow of a big tree. The man evidently did not suspect anything and was soon out of sight. O'Rourke climbed the wall after putting the melons on top and then dropped on the other side. Milton started to follow him, but was more nervous and less careful of his steps. There was a splash and a loud cry and Milton was lying prone at the bottom of a deep cistern.

The boys meanwhile had clambored into the buggy, and hearing the cry and the splash and fearing they would be caught, they started the mare and left Milton to his fate.

He scrambled with difficulty to his feet, but the water was deep and his mouth and nostrils were full of it. Only by standing on tiptoe could he breathe.

"Help! help!" he shouted at the top of his voice; his fear of drowning being greater than the desire to avoid exposure. The sides of the cistern were too smooth and the top too distant, to afford any hope of escape; so, unless somebody rescued him he stood an excellent chance of drowning with the melons, the evidences of his guilt, floating close by his person!

Fortunately for him, his cries were heard by the gardener, who went to his assistance. The man, however, did not know what the trouble was, so in order to be prepared for eventualities, he waited to light a lantern and arm himself with a stout stick, and to inform his master of the shouts.

Milton had completely broken down when the rays of the lantern fell upon him. He was half choked and was crying bitterly. With the aid of a ladder and a stout rope he was drawn out.

The boy was mortified beyond measure at finding himself confronting Mr. Walter, and still more as he saw little Carrie Walter, pale and trembling, standing by her father's side. Her gaze rested on Milton with deep sorrow, and there was in it, too, pity and real sympathy. Milton pleading with her father, though not hear what she was saying, trying to shield him in her child he knew, but how could she when there in the well were the melons, which said plainly enough Seymour is a thief?

The boy was shivering so that he not walk, and the gardener had him to the Mansion House. As his increased, he began to cry, and be sent home, but so great was the mortification that he covered with his hands, and refused to answer questions. Mr. Walter was sure that the boy had been stealing melons, but he was not the man to prison stain on a lad for such a crime. He knew his mother would correct so he determined to leave his punishment to her. He therefore ordered him to hitch up the old mare to the wagon, drive the boy home, as soon as able to stand the motion.

The man soon returned from the almost breathless, saying that the mare and the buggy had disappeared, the stable door on the lane side was open. Mr. Walter questioned Milton a matter, but getting no response from the boy, whose burning cheeks were covered with his soiled and bruised hands, the gardener and his employer went out to stable to get another wagon. When they were gone, little Carrie approached and put her hand caressingly on her brother's head. The touch spoke her sympathy for his trouble and ignored the wrong that had brought it upon him. The girl had the true woman nature, and goes out in pity to the suffering and no reproach to make. Many a man has found under richly deserved punishment found consolation in that trait of female character, when his own sex has been against him with a sense of justice.

"Don't cry, Milton, I love you," said Carrie. "It will be all over soon. Are you hurt very much? You are so wet and cold, but Papa will get you home and Mrs. Seymour will care of you. Please don't cry."

Milton could not look up, but he had head rest on the child's shoulder and the sobs shook his boyish frame, and was crying, too, but she was rejoiced the woman nature will, in the acceptance of her sympathy.

"Papa is coming," said the child, sound of heavy footsteps was heard in the hall. "Now you will go home and be well."

"No, no," Milton moaned, "I sent to prison, and mamma will be disgraced, and she will be angry, and she will be ruined."

"Oh, no," Carrie cried, "you will Papa, you are not going to send Milton to prison. I am sure he did not mean wrong. I could not bear to have him to prison."

"Then get him to say what has happened of my mare and buggy," Mr. Walter said. "He seems to be acting very strangely. He is a good boy."

But Milton maintained a sullen silence, and Mr. Walter gave up the attempt to extract anything from him. He sat down and wrote a brief note to Mrs. Seymour, telling her how and where her son was found, and giving it to his man, despatching him with it, directing him to put the boy in his wagon and drive him home as early as possible.

What mother who has suffered from such anxiety as Mrs. Seymour had endured, feels anything else but thankfulness when she recovers her child! She caressed him and wept tears of gratitude over him as she clasped him to her breast. In the pathetic language of the books, he was the only son of his mother and she was a widow. She would listen to his self-accusing words, but such measures as she knew were necessary to ward off the illness that came from his agitation and immerse. She watched by his bedside all night and was thankful to see him at last peacefully in the health-giving sleep of boyhood.

The next day Milton told his story of shame and confusion, and the mother bore to punish him. He had learned a painful experience the lesson she would have enforced, and she believed he was little likely to get into more trouble of the kind.

Their curiosity held them; they watched every move with marked interest. Finally, I drew a bottle of powerful ammonia from my pocket and incidentally put the vial to my nose. Instantly all wanted a whiff. They got it! Great amusement! Each vieing with the other in catching the newcomers. One man brought a sick child, thinking me a doctor, and that the ammonia would do it good. Poor little child, it was dying of consumption, and when I refused to let it smell the strong stuff, they appeared greatly displeased.

"All this time I was hearing the story of the fight and the burning of the place. The government story is this: The news having reached the place that three divisions of Turkish troops were approaching to attack the Druses, the women and children fled to other places, the Christians to the mountains. The Ottoman reason for the attack was that a number of Druses residing at Mejd-el-est-shems, having been engaged in robbery and murder, and the Druses generally refusing to pay taxes and acknowledge the right of the Porte to rule over them, them must be punished, hence the reserves of militia were called out and the troops sent in three divisions to attack the village.

"A few shots were fired into the town, when a white flag was displayed. A company of calvary then rode in and were told that the people would offer no resistance. The officer then warned the villagers that thousands of men surrounded them, and if any trouble arose, the place would be wiped out. The soldiers proceeded to prepare a meal on the threshing floor at the foot of the mountain on which the town

out respect to nationality or religion. The American Protestant Church was burned. Only a portion of the building, which had a metal roof and sides of stone, remained. The big bell was taken to the threshing floor. The Arabs stole all the books, including many Bibles from the American Church, and a native told me that many of the Arabs and Bedouins are reading them, or having them read to them. One man stole the large pulpit Bible, and has, as he thinks, very kindly offered to return it for $205, its market value being probably not more than $2.

"It was by no means cheering to look upon the sad faces of the orphans which the Turk had made. That fatal day, some dozen persons fled to Mt. Hermon, and in their haste took no food, and perished in a snow storm. One man was found with his tarbush on his head, and stick on shoulder, just as he had fallen in trying to find some place of shelter. A woman and a child were found frozen to death on the ice. Because Christians and the Consuls complained, a Governor was sent to Mejd-el-est-shems with orders to repair the houses of the Christians, but as soon as it was found out that he was really obeying instructions, he was removed. The instructions were given for Europeans to read about. Some 20,000 Turkish troops are now moving into the Hauran, to 'finish' the Druses." Wm. E. Geil.

Requests for Prayer.

The Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Aug. 2, in accordance with the requests of many persons among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

Conversion of relatives and Friends.

How the power of the Gospel, that he made wholly a follower of Christ. — His wife, Beaver Co., Pa., for her husband, once a church-member but through sin now a backslider, that he may be reclaimed and restored to God's power. — M. B. Grady, Mo., that his father and his mother may be converted. — M. R. L., Scranton, Pa., that a dear friend, who does not believe hereafter, might be moved by the Holy Spirit to seek Christ and give up his opposition to the Gospel. — Sorrowing mother, that her only son, who is wicked and estranged to his parents, may be brought to repentance and made a child of God. — M. E., N. Y., for the conversion of a brother, a dear friend who does not know the Saviour. — F. B., Manchester, Va., that three members of a family may be converted. They are usually blind and have no concern for the souls of their souls. — L. W. G., Chicago, Ill., in his infinite mercy would look upon a man who is a confirmed gambler and would be separated from her, and would be a soul and make him a humble, earnest Christian. — Heart-broken mother, Cedar Rapids, Ia., for a dear child, who has been led by associates into grievous trouble, that conversion may lead to conversion. — Constance, Harrisburg, Pa., that her husband, who has fallen under the power of drink, be delivered and made a new creature in Christ. — L. W., Berlin, for the conversion of her husband who is leading a sinful life. — "Lonely One," Sherwood, N. Y., that her son, who is being kept from Christ by appetite for cigarettes, might have strength to abandon them and give himself to Christ. — Sister, Mt. Selman, Tex., the conversion of three brothers. — "Believer," Kerr, Mo., for the salvation of a dear son who is very sick; also for the salvation of his son and son. — L. S. C., Elmwood, Ill., the conversion of her husband. — "Faith," a dear brother who is an agnostic may be brought to Christ and trust him for salvation. — Also that a brother-in-law who is a slave to drink and sin may be delivered and made a child of God. — Octogenarian, F. M., Md., that her daughter and son-in-law and their children might all be led to themselves to the Lord. — King's Daughter, Berly, Mass., that her father and mother may be saved and serve the Lord. — "One of us," on behalf of a boy who has many companions that God would touch his heart and bring him to repentance; also that neighbors who are straying into sinful ways be stopped and turn to the Lord. — "Mother," Vermont, that one who is in great need of God's grace. — "Heart-broken Wife," Marshfield, Mass., for the conversion of her husband and son who are both in need of God's grace. — "Mother," on N. Y., that a dear son might be saved. — "Axious Sister," Aurora, Ill., for the conversion of her father and her brothers and her who are all in the bondage of sin, but she believes if God will touch their hearts in answer to the prayers which have been offered in their behalf for many years.

Restoration of Health. F. E. G., Cawker City, Kan., for the recovery of a mother who has long been afflicted. — A. L. B., Abbeyville, Ga., that her husband, who seems to be beyond the power of physicians, might be healed by the Lord. — "Reader," Rippey, Ia., that a dear son, a sufferer for a long time past, may be restored to health. — M. B., Neuchatel, for the recovery of a mother in great distress of mind and afflicted with nervous disorder. — C. A. S., Napoli, N. Y., for the recovery of two dear friends, one of whom seems to be nearing death. — "Sister in Christ," Lancaster, Wis., that God would heal a little niece who is threatened with consumption and whose life is very dear to all her family. — Believer, Kerr, Mo., that a friend who is sick may be restored to health and her eyesight be regained. — L. A., Rhine-land, Wis., that a devoted servant of Christ whose mind has become unbalanced by labor and study, may recover his faculties and re-sume his pulpit labors. — M. A. F., Sherwood, N. Y., that a daughter may regain her health so that she may be able to return to school and finish her education. — I. E., Nashville, Tenn., that two of God's children now in sorrow and suffering may be restored to health, and receive grace from God to bear their afflictions with patience. — F. B., Manchester, Va., that health and strength may be given to a precious mother who suffers from often recurring sickness. — C., Philadelphia, that her dear grand-daughter, a sufferer from hip-disease, may be healed. — The following persons also ask prayers that God would heal them: A. B., Marion, N. Y.; Faith, Richmond, Tex.; E. S. D., Rockville Centre, N. Y.; L. B. J., Greenville, S. C.

For Special Blessings. E. J. W., Mayesville, S. C., that God would hear the prayers of his people for the money needed to build a school house, that the colored children might be helped to an education by which they can earn an honest living. — Frail Believer, Greensburg, Ind., that grace may be given her to resist evil thoughts and evil ways that are ruining body and soul. — Richard Dress, Los Angeles, Cal., that God would bless the effort being made in his name to reclaim lost souls and grant the means necessary to support a new mission. — "Faith," that a suffering mother whose life is fast ebbing away, may have light in her last days and grace to hold fast to her Saviour. — "Believer," Grant's Pass, Ore., that an aged couple, grievously embarrassed, may receive the help they need for the discharge of just obligations. — Worried Father, Brooklyn, N. Y., that undutiful children and a wife who occasions anxiety may, by the Holy Spirit's influence, be brought into better relations and do their duty in their respective spheres, submitting themselves to the guidance of God and resting lovingly in his care. — Sorrowful, Mt. Selman, Tex., that members of a family now estranged may be united in Christ and love each other. — S. S., North Victory, N. Y., that the way may be opened to pay just debts incurred through business depression, and that a young man willing and anxious to work may find employment. — Reader, North-borough, Mass., that a dear brother who has fallen under the influence of a wicked woman, may have strength to quit her company and lead a virtuous life. — M. D. R., Baltimore, Md., for a dear father earnestly endeavoring to make his way to support himself and his family, that God would bless his efforts and give him success. — Subscriber, Woodhull, N. Y., for grace to overcome an evil disposition and follow the Lord with a true heart. — S. A., Marion, Pa., that one who has been well loved and fully trusted, may appreciate the love he once earnestly sought, but now despises and may keep the promises he made. — Reader, Penrith, Manitoba, for light on the way of salvation and grace to find peace. — "Faith," Baltimore, Md., for wisdom to see the path of duty and strength to walk in it. — Weak One, Orangeville, Ont., that obstacles in the way of consecration may be removed. — W. H. C., for deliverance from evil and wicked desires, and for more of Christ's spirit. — "Sorrowing Father," New York, that his daughter whose violent temper is making home miserable, may be brought to see the evil of her ways and seek help from the Saviour whose name she bears. — "Anxious Husband," that his wife, whose love has been alienated, may come to love and trust her husband as she used to do, and may give up the society of wicked men. — "Apprehensive One," New York, who fears that his mind is becoming diseased, that God would give him mental strength that he may continue to support his dependent family. — "Sub-missive," New York, that a brother and sister may be enabled to pay a just debt contracted some time ago, and may see that it is their duty to pay it. — "Humiliated Father," Boston, Mass., that his two daughters may be delivered from an evil propensity, and be kept from bringing disgrace on their family and the church and C. E. Society, of which they are members. — Epworth Leaguer, Chicago, for wisdom to deal rightly as to two fellow members who have been guilty of secret sin, and that he may be enabled so to act as to save them from a repetition of the sin.

From the various compartments, each different nationality is led by a passage-way to the desks of the recording clerks, when they are required to answer the nineteen questions we have already mentioned. If the answers are satisfactory, they are allowed to pass the desk and proceed to the railroad ticket-room, the dining-room or to the boat for New York City.

One of our illustrations shows the main hall with at least a thousand immigrants waiting to be admitted to the United States. There are sometimes several thousand on the floor at once representing a score of nationalities and all in their pe-fall, when the greatest number of immigrants arrive.

On entering this country, each immigrant is taxed fifty cents, and this revenue goes to the Treasury Department of the general government, which appropriates $100,000 per annum for the fixed salaries and other expenses of the Immigration Department. Every facility is provided for aiding the new arrivals to reach their ultimate destination safely and speedily. Besides the general ticket office there are an exchange for foreign money, dining rooms where a thousand can feed simultaneously, sleeping quarters, detention rooms, a hospital, a contagious disease building, and missionary quarters. In the last named, from six to ten missionaries are stationed daily to attend to the spiritual sia, Norway and Sweden, Great Britain, Ireland, Turkey and Greece. The greatest number from any one country came from Italy which sent us 66,445. As far as could be ascertained the sum total of all the immigrants' wealth was $3,534,399. 2,512 persons were returned to their port of sailing, being excluded under the law.

Ellis Island, on a busy day, is an interesting place. One sees there the various ordeals through which the immigrants must pass before being admitted. They are transported from the steamship piers to the Island on packet-boats and barges, some of which may be seen in the photograph of Ellis Island which appears in this issue. On arrival at the Island, they are conducted to the second floor of the cular native costumes. Some picturesque sights are thus afforded. Emigrant steamer days are busy ones at the Island, and the officials are taxed to the extent of their ability when several steamers arrive simultaneously. Ellis Island is a Government station under the direction of the Treasury Department. Dr. J. H. Senner is Commissioner of Immigration at the port, with

A SHADOW ON THE HARVEST-FIELD.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: II. Kings 4: 18, 19, 20, "And when the child was grown, it fell on a day that he went out to his father to the reapers. And he said unto his father, my head, my head! And he said to a lad, carry him to his mother. And when he had taken him, and brought him to his mother, he sat on her knees till noon, and then died."

HERE is at least one happy home in Shunem. To the luxuriance and splendor of a great house, had been given the advent of a child. Even when the Angel of Life brings a new soul to the poor man's hut, a star of joy shines over the manger. Infancy, with its helplessness and innocence, had passed away. Days of boyhood had come—days of laughter and frolic, days of sunshine and promise, days of strange questions and curiosity and quick development. I suppose among all the treasures of that house, the brightest was the boy. One day there is the shout of reapers heard afield. A boy's heart always bounds at the sound of sickle or scythe. No sooner have the harvesters cut a swath across the field than the lad joins them, and the swarthy reapers feel young again as they look down at that lad, as bright and beautiful as was Ruth in the harvest fields of Bethlehem gleaning after the reapers. But the sun was too hot for him. Congestion of the brain seized on him. I see the swarthy laborers drop their sickles; and they rush out to see what is the matter, and they fan him and they try to cool his brow; but all is of no avail. In the instant of consciousness, he puts his hands against his temples and cries out: "My head! my head!" And the father said: "Carry him to his mother," just as any father would have said; for our hand is too rough, and our voice is too harsh, and our foot is too loud to doctor a sick child, if there be in our home a gentler voice and a gentler hand and a stiller footstep. But all of no avail. While the reapers of Shunem were busy in the field, there came a stronger reaper that way, with keener scythe and for a richer harvest. He reaped only one sheaf, but O what a golden sheaf was that! I do not want to know any more about that heart-breaking scene than what I see in just this one pathetic sentence: "He sat on her knees till noon, and then died." Though hundreds of years have passed away since that boy skipped to the harvest-field and then was brought home and died on his mother's lap, the story still thrills us. Indeed, childhood has a charm always and everywhere. I shall now speak to you of childhood; its beauty, its susceptibility to impression, its power over the parental heart, and its blissful transition from earth to heaven.

The child's beauty does not depend upon form or feature or complexion or apparel. That destitute one that you saw on the street, bruised with unkindness and in rags, has a charm about her, even under her destitution. You have forgotten a great many persons who have not a finely cut feature and with erect posture and well-trained muscles. When you will always remember the poor girl who, on a cold, moonlight night, as you were passing late home, in her thin shawl and barefoot on the pavement, put out her hand and said: "Please to give me a penny." Ah! how often we have walked on and said: "O, that is nothing but street vagabondism;" but after we got a block or two on, we stopped and said: "Ah, that is not right;" and we passed up that same way and dropped a mite into that suffering hand, as though it were not a matter of second thought, so ashamed were we of our hard-heartedness. With what admiration we all look upon a group of children on the play-ground or in the school, and we clap our hands almost involuntarily, and say: "How beautiful!" All stiffness and dignity are gone, and your shout is heard with theirs and you trundle their hoop, and fly their kite, and strike their ball, and all your weariness and anxiety are gone as when a child you bounded over the play-ground yourself. That father who stands rigid and unsympathetic amid the sportfulness of children, ought never to have been tempted out of a crusty and unredeemable solitariness. The waters leap down the rocks, but they have not the graceful step of childhood. The morning comes out of the gates of the East, throwing its silver on the lake and its gold on the towers and its fire on the cloud; but it is not so bright and beautiful as the morning of life! There is no light like that which is kindled in a child's eye, no color like that which blooms on a child's cheek, no music like the sound of a child's voice. Its face in the poorest picture redeems any imperfection in art. When we are weary with toil, their little hands pull the burdens off our back. O, what a dull, stale, mean world this would be without the sportfulness of children. When I find people that do not like children, I immediately doubt their moral and Christian character. But when the grace of God comes upon a child, how unspeakably attractive. When Samuel begins to pray, and Timothy begins to read the Scriptures, and Joseph shows himself invulnerable to temptation—how beautiful the scene! I know that parents sometimes get nervous when their children become pious, because they have the idea that good children always die. The strange questions about God and eternity and the dead, excite apprehension in the parental mind rather than congratulation. Indeed, there are some people that seem marked for heaven. This world is too poor a garden for them to bloom in. The hues of heaven are in the petals. There is something about them, something that makes you think that the hand of Christ has been on it, saying: "Let this one come to Me, and let it come to Me soon." While that one tarried in the house, you felt there was an angel in the room, and you thought that every sickness would be the last; and when, finally, the winds of death did scatter the leaves, you were no more surprised than to see a star come out above the cloud on a dark night; for you had often said to your companion: "My dear, we shall never raise that child." But I scout the idea that good children always die. Samuel the pious boy, became Samuel the great prophet. Christian Timothy became a minister at Ephesus. Young Daniel, consecrated to God, became prime minister of all the realm, and there are in hundreds of the schools and families of this country to-day, children who love God and keep his commandments, and who are to be foremost among the Christians and the philanthropists and the reformers of the next century. The grace of God never kills any one. A child will be more apt to grow up with religion than it will be apt to grow up without it. Length of days is promised to the righteous. The religion of Christ does not cramp the chest or curve the spine or weaken the nerves. There are no malarias floating up from the river of life. The religion of Christ throws over the heart and life of a child a supernal beauty. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

I pass on to consider the susceptibility of childhood: Men pride themselves on their unchangeability. They will make an elaborate argument to prove that they think now just as they did twenty years ago. It is charged to frailty or fraud when a man changes his sentiments in politics or in religion, and it is this determination of soul that so often drives back the Gospel from a man's heart. It is so hard to make avarice charitable, and fraud honest, and pride humble, and scepticism Christian. The sword of God's truth seems to glance off from those mailed warriors, and the helmet seems battle-proof against God's battle-axe. But childhood; how susceptible to example and to instruction! You are not surprised at the record: "Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob;" for when religion starts in a family, it is apt to go all through. Jezebel a murderess, you are not surprised to find her son Jehoram attempting assassination. Oh, what a responsibility upon the parent and the teacher! The musician touches the keys, and the response of those keys is away off amid the pipes and the chords, and you wonder at the distance between the key and the chord. And so it is in life; if you touch a child, the results will come back from manhood or old age, telling just the tune played, whether the dirge of a great sorrow or the anthem of a great joy. The word that the Sabbath School teacher will this afternoon whisper in the ear of the class, will be echoed back from everlasting ages of light or darkness. The home and the school decide the republic or the despotism; the barbarism or the civilization; the upbuilding of an empire, or the overthrowing of it. Higher than Parliament or Congress are the school and the family, and the sound of a child's foot may mean more than the tramp of a host. What, then, are you doing for the purpose of bringing your children into the kingdom of God? If they are so susceptible, and if this is the very best time to act upon their eternal interests, what are you doing by way of right impulsion? There were some harvesters in the fields of Scotland one hot day; and Hannah Lemond was helping them gather the hay. She laid her babe under a tree. While she was busy in the field, there was a flutter of wings in the air, and a golden eagle clutched the swaddling band of the babe, and flew away with it to the mountain eyrie. All the harvesters and Hannah Lemond started for the cliffs. It was two miles before they came to the foot of the cliffs. Getting there, who dared to mount the cliff? No human foot had ever trod it. There were sailors there who had gone up the mast in the day of terrible tempest; they did not dare risk it. Hannah Lemond sat there for awhile and looked up and saw the eagle in the eyrie, and then she leaped to her feet, and she started up where no human foot had ever trod, crag above crag, catching hold of this root or that root, until she reached the eyrie and caught her babe, the eagle swooping in fierceness all around about her. Fastening the child to her back, she started for her friends and for home. O, what a dizzy descent! sliding from this crag to that crag, catching by the vine and by that root, coming down faster and further, to the most dangerous pass, where she found a goat and some kids. She said: "Now I'll follow the goat; the goat will know just which is the best way down;" and she was led by the animal down to the plain. When she got there, all the people cried: "Thank God, thank God!" her strength not giving out until the rescue was effected. Another cried: "Stand back, now. Give her a rest. O, if a woman will do that for the physical life of her child, what will she do for the eternal life of your boy or your girl? Let it not be told in the day of eternity that Hannah Lemond forth more exertion for the saving the physical life of her child than you, parent, have ever put forth for the life of your little one. God help you!"

I pass on to consider the power which a child wields over the parental heart. We often talk about the influence of parents upon children. I never hear anything about the influence of children upon their parents. You go to school to them. You no more educate them than they educate you. With their little hands they have caught hold of your entire nature and cannot wrench yourself away from their grasp. You are different men and women from what you were before they gave you the first lesson. They have revolutionized your soul. There are fountains of joy in your heart which never would have been discovered had they not discovered them. Life is to you a more stupendous thing than it was before those little feet started on the pathway to eternity. Oh, how many hopes, how many joys, how many solitudes that little one has put in your soul. You go to school even to a school of self-denial, a school of patience, in which you are getting wisdom by day; and that influence of theirs over you will increase and increase, though your children may die, from the very throne of God they will reach you an influence to your soul, leading you and leading you up until you mingle their voices and sit beside their throne.

The grasp which the child has over the parent's heart is seen in what the child will do for the child. Storm and danger and heat and cold are nothing to them; they stand between you and your child's welfare. A great lawyer, when you know, one day stood in the court and made an eloquent plea before the men of great legal attainments; and the gentleman said to him afterward: "How could you be so calm standing in that august presence?" "Oh," said Erskine, "I felt my children pulling at my skirt and crying for bread." What stream will you not swim, what cavern will you not enter, what battle will you not fight, what hunger will you not endure for your children? Your children must have food, though you starve. Your children must be well clothed though you go in rags. You say: "My children shall be educated though I never had any chance." But to you are weary limbs, and aching head, and hands hardened and callous, if only the welfare of your children can be wrought out by it? Their sorrow is your sorrow, their joy your joy, their adversity your victory. And, oh, when the last sickness comes, how you fight the march of disease, and it is only a tremendous struggle that you survive. And then when the spirit has fled the great deep is broken up, and Rachel is not comforted because her children are not, and David goes up the palace stairs, crying: "Oh Absalom, my son, my son, would God I had died for thee, Oh Absalom, my son, my son."

There is not a large family, or hardly a large family that has not bent over some treasure and lost it. In the family is there no dead lamb? I have seen many such cases of sorrow. There is one eminent in my memory as pastor—ve Haynes McCollum. The story of his death has brought hundreds unto God. He belonged to my parish in the West. A through boy, nine or ten years of age. Nothing morbid, nothing dull about him. His voice loudest and his foot swiftest on the playground. Often he has come into my house and thrown himself down on the floor in an exhaustion of boisterous mirth; and yet he was a Christian, consecrated to God, keeping his commandments. That is the kind of childish piety I believe in. When the days of sickness came suddenly and he was told that he could not get well, he said: "Jesus alone can save me. Jesus will save me. He has saved me. Don't cry, mamma. I shall go straight up to heaven." And then they gave him a glass of water to cool his hot mouth, and he said: "Mamma, I shall take a draught from the water of life after awhile, which if one drink, he shall never get thirsty again. I lay myself at Jesus' feet. I want him to do just what he thinks fit to do with me," and he cried out: "O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory?" And so, with a peace indescribable, he passed away.

"Oh, there is nothing sad about a child's death save the grief in the parent's heart. To see the little ones go right out from a world of sin and suffering to a world of glory. How many sorrows they escape, how many temptations, how many troubles! Children dead are safe. Those that are in peril. We know not what dark death they may take. The day may come which they will break your heart; but children dead are safe—safe forever. Weeping parents, do not mourn too bitterly over your child that has gone. There are no kinds of prayers made at a child's sick-bed. One prayer the Lord likes; the other prayer he does not like. When a father kneels down at a child's sick-bed and says: "O Lord, spare this little one; he is very near to my heart; I don't want to part with him, but thy will be done,"—that is the kind of a prayer the Lord loves. There is another kind of prayer which I have heard men make in substance when they say: "O Lord, this isn't right; it is hard to take this child; you have no right to take this child; spare this child; I can't give him up, and I won't give him up." The Lord answers that kind of a prayer sometimes. The child lives on and lives on, and travels off in paths of wickedness and perish. At the end of every prayer for a child's life, say: "Thy will, O Lord, be done."

The brightest lights that can be kindled, Christ has kindled. Let us, old and young, rejoice that heaven is gathering up so much that is attractive. In that far land we are not strangers. There are those there who speak our name day by day, and they wonder why so long we tarry. If I could count up the names of all those who have gone out from these families into the kingdom of heaven, it would take me all day to mention their names. A great multitude before the throne. You loved them once; you love them now; and ever and anon you think you hear their voices calling you upward. Ah, yes, they have gone out from all these families, and you want no book to tell you of the dying experience of Christian children. You have heard it; it has been whispered in your ear, O father, O mother, O brother, O sister. Toward that good land all Christians are bearing. This snapping of heart-strings, this flight of years, this tread of the heart reminds us that we are passing away. Before we mount our throne, before we drink of the fountain, before we strike the harp of our eternal celebration, we will cry out: "Where are our loved and lost?" And then, how we shall gather them up! O, how we shall gather them up!

In this dark world of sin and pain
We only meet to part again;
But when we reach the heavenly shore
We there shall meet to part no more.
The hope that we shall see that day
Should chase our present griefs away;
When these short years of pain are past
We'll meet before the throne at last.

A Notable Semi-Centennial.

Fiftieth Anniversary of the First Reformed Church of Bound Brook, N. J.—The Religious Home of the Talmage Family—The Church in which Dr. Talmage first Confessed his Faith.

THE twenty-seventh of August will be an eventful day in the history of the First Reformed Church of Bound Brook, N. J. It will on that day celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its organization. A picture of the church appears on this page. It is a plain, unadorned structure, and the fact of its holding a jubilee celebration would have but little interest outside the village, but for an association which appeals to great multitudes of Christians in this and other lands. As the Psalmist said of Zion: "The Lord shall count when he writeth up his people that this and that man was born there." It was in this little village church that the first step was taken in a Christian career which has world-wide influence. It was there that Dr. Talmage publicly declared himself on the Lord's side and consecrated his life to Christ.

The Church stands on the south bank of the Raritan, on a beautiful bend of that wide, sweeping river. It must have been a charming spot fifty years ago when the Church was first erected. The canal and river stretch away to the east and west, the morning and evening sun alternately glinting them both in beauty, while just across the river lay the old battlefield and the little hamlet of North Bound Brook, and belicity of Rev. Ravard K. Rogers, D.D., pastor of the Presbyterian Church, that he favored this new enterprise, and took part in the services when the Church was dedicated, although it fell into the hands of another denomination. Surely there were liberal minds in former days as well as in our time.

The Church was organized in August, 1846, in the Franklin School House. But a church building was soon needed, and on May 10th, 1848, the present house of worship was dedicated. The ministers of the neighborhood came together to give it their benediction. The services were commenced by Rev. Dr. Messler offering prayer. Then the Rev. R. K. Rogers read the 84th Psalm. After singing a hymn, Rev. David D. Demarest, D.D., lead in prayer, and the pastor of the new church, Rev. George J. Van Neste, gave an address. Rev. George H. Fisher, of New York, preached the sermon from Heb. 11: 10, and dedicated the Church, and Dr. Rogers made the concluding prayer.

The Church began under excellent auspices, and with sufficient members to become at once an efficient and self-supporting organization. The first Consistory were: John Lane, Cornelius Messler, Jacob H. Wykoff, and Caleb C. Brokaw, elders, and Andrew Todd, Daniel H. Voorhees, Elias B. Van Arsdale, and Henry C. Brokaw, deacons. The first pastor was Rev. George J. Van Neste, an able and successful preacher. Mr. Van Neste is still living and vigorous, and expects to be present at the semi-centennial celebra-be present at the jubilee service, and has promised to preach at 2.30 p. m. His sermon will doubtless be rich in autobiographical memories. In accepting the invitation to be present, Dr.

REV. GEORGE J. VAN NESTE.

Talmage wrote: "Your letter touches me with many pleasant memories. I can see just where the old folks sat in the Church, and I remember well the affrighted day when I appeared before the consistory, applying for membership." It is with pardonable pride that the Church will welcome at the Jubilee her distinguished son, whose fame and usefulness are household words in the Christian homes of the whole world. Through him this little Church has brought its influence to bear upon all Christendom. How the importance of the family relation and of Church membership will be emphasized on that day!

Dr. Talmage is the youngest of the ten children who filled the family pew in the old church half a century ago. He has often referred in his sermons to those boyhood days. He was the last of the family to give his heart to Christ, and his father and mother rejoiced as they saw the young man complete the family circle in the church. He was the fourth of their sons to become a minister. These were: James R., a young preacher of great prominence, who died at the opening of a career of usefulness; Goyn, a gifted speaker and writer, who died in 1891; and John Van Neste, the famous missionary to China, whose labors in that land were wonderfully blessed, and who died in 1892.

The Church has had a succession of able and godly ministers. Mr. Van Neste's successors were: William Demarest, from 1854 to 1857; Henry V. Voorhees, 1858 to 1862; Benjamin F. Romaine, 1862 to 1868; Jacob C. Dutcher, 1869 to 1879; John E. Lvall, 1880 to 1881; David M. Talmage, 1882 to 1884; Augustus F. Todd, 1884 to 1886; James F. Schock, 1887 to 1891; Albert L. Mershon, 1893 to 1896.

The present pastor is Rev. Charles T. Anderson, who was called to this Church in March last. He is a graduate of Princeton College and Theological Seminary. On his mother's side he belongs to one of the oldest Dutch families in Somerset County. His ancestors settled along the Millstone in 1688. His great grandfather, John H. Schenck, was a Colonel in the War of the Revolution, and his father, who was a native of Scotland, served in the war with Mexico. As a writer, preacher and pastor he has been eminently successful. Under his ministrations this now historic Church enters upon the second half century of its existence with bright prospects. An efficient board of elders and deacons, consisting of E. H. Redfield, Wm. H. Ayers, F. E. Smith, W. D. Voorhees, John Jennings, John Matthews, A. V. Hall and J. C. Tantum, earnestly co-operate with the new pastor. The people are making at this time a Jubilee Thank-Offering with which to enlarge the Church by the addition of rooms for Sunday School and Young Peoples' Societies.

hind them, the hills where Washington once encamped with his army. A great railroad and manufacturing village has since grown up around the spot.

When the old Presbyterian Church of Bound Brook became too small to hold its increasing attendants, this Church was built on the opposite side of the river. The congregation was formed principally from families who had been in communion with the Presbyterian Church, with whom were connected a few from Millstone and Somerville. It speaks well for the catholicity. He was licensed to preach by the Classis of New Brunswick in July, 1846, and ordained in the Presbyterian Church, Bound Brook, May 18th, 1847, so that the fiftieth anniversary of his ministry nearly corresponds with the semi-centennial of the Church of which he was first pastor.

It was during Mr. Van Neste's pastorate that Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., then a young man of eighteen, united with the Church on confession of faith. Dr. Talmage's father was by that time an elder in the Church. Dr. Talmage expects to David's Love for God's House.

Sunday School Lesson for Sept. 6. I. Chron. 22: 6-16. Golden Text, Psalm 84: 4.
By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HERE are special epochs marked indelibly in the life of every true child of God; times of meeting with the Lord, whether it be in mercy or in judgment, which cannot be forgotten. Such was the solemn meeting of David with his God in the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite, after he had fallen into the snare of the enemy, and had numbered the people in the pride of his heart and not after God. Even the worldly, time-serving Joab had rebuked the king in this; but David persisted in having his will. Because "God was displeased with this thing, therefore he smote Israel." And David awoke to the consciousness of his sin, and confessed it fully before the Lord for his heart smote him. Then it was that, through the prophet Gad, God offered him one of three things; three years' famine, three months' defeat and flight before his enemies, or "three days the sword of the Lord, even the pestilence in the land, and the angel of the Lord destroying throughout all the coasts of Israel." David had chosen the last; he had said, "I am in let me fall now into the hand of the Lord; for very great are his mercies; but let me not fall into the hand of man." And the dread scourge of pestilence swept away seventy thousand of the number which David had taken a pride in numbering! There is always a relation between God's judgments and those things in our lives which he judges by them. In response to the intercession by David, who took all the blame upon himself (the mark of a man who lives near to God), and that of the elders of Israel, the destroying angel sheathed his sword over the threshing place of Araunah, and there David set up an altar and offered sacrifice. The land was consecrated by the blood of the offering where God was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed. Some men when they have sinned and found a sense of pardon through faith in the blood of Christ, say lightly, "Well, it is under the blood!" and they turn lightly to something else, as though that were the end of it. David, on the contrary, marked the place which reminded him of his sin and God's mercy, and he said, "This is the house of the Lord God, and this is the offering for Israel" (I. Chron. 22: 1), and it is expressly said that it was "because God answered him there." And he continued to sacrifice in that place instead of at Gibeon (I. Chron. 21: 28-30).

It would seem also as though this fall and restoration had been instrumentally the means of stirring up David to make preparation for the building of the temple. God has set before us a much greater object than David had in his mind. The temple he sought to build was made with hands; it was destructible. But a temple not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, a habitation of God through the Spirit is in course of erection, built not with hands, but of "living stones." As David was impelled after his restoration, to turn from his own interests to the interests of God's house; so, if we know anything of the true zeal of the Holy Ghost, the true Spirit of Christ, we find our interests drawn out to the "spiritual house," God's building for his own habitation.

It was David's joy to make preparation for the house of the Lord. No longer engaged in subduing his enemies, all his last days were occupied, as long as his strength held out, in preparing the material for the temple. How blessed it is when a Christian who is growing old, and who is no longer in conflict with sin, because he knows the Lord himself, and has handed over all the conflict to him, spends his days as an instrument of the Holy Spirit to prepare the dear children of God around him, by his prayers and by any ministry of the Word given to him, in public or in private, to take their true place in the temple of the living God!

David assembled all the representatives of Israel and told them how it had been in his heart to build a house for the Lord.

And the king made known to them how God had chosen Solomon as his successor, and had adopted him as his son, and declared that he should build his house, and that, if he proved faithful, his kingdom should be established forever. Then, in presence of the assembly, the royal father gave a charge to his successor: "And thou Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart and with a willing mind, for the Lord searcheth all hearts and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts: if thou seek him, he will be found of thee; but if thou forsake him, he will cast thee off forever." Did Solomon remember these solemn words after he had slipped back from God? "Take heed, now," continued David, "for the Lord hath chosen thee to build a house for the sanctuary; be strong and do it."

David counted the first necessity for the building of the house to be knowledge of God. "Know thou the God of thy father." All the beauty of architecture, all the riches and grandeur of the building would not please God if he who built, and who worshipped there, did not really know his God. Oh, how blessed it will be, how certainly it will be when Christ reigns on earth, that all church architecture and church building will hold a very secondary place to that life eternal which is to know the only true God and Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent. And it was not enough to know him, "Serve him with a perfect heart," from whom no imagination of the thoughts is hidden. A living church often is a power where the external building is of little account. Christ was born in a stable and had not where to lay his head; he seeks not classic architecture but yielded human hearts to dwell in. "All this," said David, "the Lord made me to understand in writing by his hand upon me, were all the works of this pattern" (vers. 11, 12, 19). Those were holy moments, in which, pen in hand, he listened to God who taught him his mind about the building. If he would come thus near in those times in which the Holy Spirit was not given to dwell in us as now, how much more are we privileged and responsible to do every common thing in holy and constant communion with our God! Solomon was to do nothing whatsoever for the gratification of his taste: the building was to be an expression of God's thought, not man's. How different to the buildings raised now to glorify the architect, or the pride of the church members, or the wealth of a city!

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

TWO pictures are given of David's closing years. In the opening chapters of Kings we have the pathetic picture of the once energetic, stalwart warrior lying helpless on his bed, shivering and decrepit. Though not yet seventy years old, his vitality is exhausted and his family and physicians are consulting how they can keep warmth in his emaciated frame. The hardships and troubles and mental conflicts of his eventful life had worn him out. Prematurely aged, he was wrote the Chronicles, but an incidental remark (I. Chron. 9: 1) gives a clue to date of his work. It shows that at least six hundred years had elapsed since the death of David when he sat down to write the Chronicles. The minute particulars he gives of the Temple services and arrangements indicate that he was probably one of the Levites engaged in the Temple services. We can therefore imagine to him everything pertaining to the order of the Temple took an importance given to it by the older writer of the Kings and how David, separated from him by a longer interval than that which separates us from the time of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, had become an ideal hero of a tant age. He dwells on the good points of his character, and especially on his sionate desire for the erection of a magnificent Temple, and omits all mention of signs of physical and moral weakness which would detract from the grandeur of his ideal. So we get two pictures, the later one of a being most perfect, and the earlier one from pen of a man near enough to his subject to see the flaws and blemishes and frailties and weaknesses of its nature. There however, sufficient evidence in the early history to show that with all his faults David had the grand qualities ascribed him by the later historian, and we sympathize with a man writing at a time when the nation had no king and was resting on sufferance, looking back with pride to the glory of David's reign, and painting his picture in glowing colors.

Timber also and stone have I prepared. A recent traveler in the Holy Land, who spent much time in identifying ancient sites writes: "There are several places in the Temple area where stones have been beveled joints, which are the signs of Solomon's workmen. These stones, as I looked at them, were, I was convinced some of the stones that David collected three thousand years ago, for his magnificent son to put in the wall. There are also, three courses of huge stones, which without doubt the handiwork of Solomon's workmen is seen. They are such curious position that they seemed to have been fired out from the inside through a breach in the wall, there caught and held fast instead of falling to the ground. A careful view leaves no doubt that they formed the segment of an arch, for the outward surfaces are worn to a true curve. They must have formed part of one of the arches of the great bridge, over which Solomon and his grand retinue passed when he went to the Temple to worship. The fragment of the arch covered with foliage was first noticed by Dr. Edward Robinson, and has been called Robinson's arch in honor of its discoverer."

A hundred thousand talents of gold. The silver mentioned would make treasure valued at nearly five thousand million dollars. It is inconceivable that David should have amassed such sums. The prevalent opinion now is that there has been a copyist's mistake in the figures. It may easily have been so when we see that the Hebrew character for one thousand differs from the character for one only in having two dots over it and the character representing two hundred is like the character for four as to need very acute eyes to distinguish them. Besides some allowance must be made for the natural disposition of a man whose whole life was absorbed in the Temple when six centuries after it was built he was writing a description of the edifice. There is no reason to doubt, however, that David's collection was on a gigantic scale and was a wonder of Oriental magnificence.

Build the house of the Lord thy God. Orthodox Jews still cherish the hope that their Messiah will yet come and build a Temple in Jerusalem, surpassing in grandeur that of Solomon. We know that their hope will be fulfilled in a way they do not yet understand. The Temple which the Divine Son of David is building is composed of living stones, that is of men in whom God dwells. The magnificence of Solomon's Temple even if we accept the figures in Chronicles cannot compare in value with that. What is a man worth? We have heard recently of a merchant in New York who stands ready to give a million dollars to anyone who will restore his sight. If one sense is worth so much, what must be our estimate of the value of a man? So the Temple of Christ composed of living men will be a Temple of infinite value and God will dwell in it.

ROBINSON'S ARCH, A PART OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.

lying almost unconscious of the events going on around him and needing to be aroused by others to the fact that his long cherished desire to have Solomon succeed him was being thwarted. In Chronicles we have a very different picture. David is busily arranging for the building of the Temple, collecting precious stones, gold, silver, rare woods and other materials for its adornment and contracting with skilled architects and laborers for the great work. He proceeds to further detail in organizing a choir and the succession of priests and Levites for the Temple services. Finally he summons a great national council and stands up and makes a long speech reviewing the events of his reign and formally abdicating in favor of Solomon and solemnly charging him to build the Temple according to the plans which he intimates (I. Chron. 28: 18) God himself had prepared. Then he takes a touching farewell of all and lies down to die; and Solomon reigns in his stead. It is not difficult to understand the reason of the contrast in the two pictures. We do not know who Peterson, Swedish Missionary; Mr. Yonze Weckbacher, American Tract Society; and Mr. Carl Schiek, Swedish Lutheran Synod.

These faithful workers are provided with desks and cabinets for their correspondence and printed matter, and one of the largest and most commodious rooms in the building has been set apart for their use. They are constantly on the outlook for those in need of spiritual advice and, though the time in which they have to labor is short, the immigrants are greatly benefited by their counsels as well as by tracts and Bibles handed them. During 1895, 56,030 Bibles and Testaments in twenty-one different languages were distributed among the immigrants at the island, by the New York Bible Society, and this work of spreading the Word goes on increasing every year. It has proved innumerable cases, seed sown in good ground and many are the grateful letters received acknowledging kindness that has been shown to total strangers. Indeed, all immigrants are appreciative of whatever is done in their behalf, and in many cases it is solely through the kindly interest the missionaries take in them that strangers are assisted in finding their relatives and friends in this country, and thus escaping the danger of being sent back to the country from which they came. Many settlers in the far West remember the kind words and cordial reception tendered them while on Ellis Island, have written to the missionaries warmly expressing their gratitude.

In former years, the new-comers from foreign lands were frequently plundered by cunning rogues who laid traps to deceive them. Now, however, they are surrounded by safeguards on every side. The misstep and gone astray, had it not been for such timely assistance.

When an immigrant is held for inspection and examination, if not satisfactory at the outset, he or she is brought before the Board at Ellis Island. Last year there were 40,539 cases tried in the court-room. Many pathetic scenes take place in this apartment. Not a few of the strangers come here penniless and without a trade. Some are beggars and outcasts from other countries; others are contract laborers who come here already engaged. These all have to be returned under the law. The Board, however, is lenient, and only a small proportion of the whole is ever returned.

One of our photographs shows the "pen" at the rear end of the building with a number of immigrants who are waiting to be returned to the land from which they came, being either paupers, ex-convicts, contract laborers or cripples, and liable to become a public charge if admitted. Another presents a view of the Board or Court-room with a trio of new arrivals undergoing examination. Other pictures show the method of to supply such help as they require. The men are tailors, laborers, silver-smiths, blacksmiths, and farmers, and are honest, obedient and easily taught.

One of the most vigilant corps of officials on the island is the Contract Labor Bureau, which is under the charge of Supervising-Inspector John J. Quinlan. Its officers have to keep a sharp lookout for those coming to this country under labor contract. Last year, 756 arrivals were sent back, in consequence of having come in violation of the Contract Labor Law.

In dealing with the thousands of immigrants of all nationalities, it is necessary to have as interpreters men having command of many languages. The official corps of interpreters includes several men who can speak fluently in half a dozen tongues. Major Charles Semsey (whose portrait we publish) is probably the most accomplished of the number, and travelling in the West, it is a daily incident to see groups of foreign immigrants on the regular trains of every railroad that reaches out over our vast territory. All of these have passed successfully through the various ordeals at Ellis Island, and are now en route for their new homes in the land of their adoption. Thus, from week to week, and year after year, the great tide of immigration flows on, bringing honest brawn and muscle from the Old World to the New.

The great responsibility devolving upon Commissioner McSweeney and his subordinates is one that cannot be overestimated. They are the guardians at the sea-gate of the Union, and upon their wisdom and judgment must depend the admission or exclusion of the tens of thousands who come here annually; but the Ellis Island system is a liberal one, and, without doing injustice to the immigrants, takes all necessary precautions to prevent the reception of any who would be a burden upon or a menace to the welfare of the community. Of late years, our immigration laws have been more and more stringent, as the number of arrivals has increased, and it is not improbable that this stringency may become still more pronounced, as new laws on this subject are passed by Congress. There are few greater problems before the American people at the present time than that which deals with the imposition of wholesome restrictions upon immigration—such restrictions as will result in admitting only the really worthy to the liberty and blessings of our common Union, and of closing the doors against those who may come unworthily seeking American citizenship.

Tibet Opening Her Doors.

After long striving, Tibet, till now a land sealed against Christianity, has at last been persuaded to open her doors to the missionaries of the Gospel. Within a very short time the borderland will be fully occupied by missions, and still others will be planted in the interior. The China Inland Mission has just arranged to open six new stations, under the direction of Miss Annie Taylor, the courageous woman missionary, who, at the risk of her own life, explored a considerable section of missionary work on Ellis Island, where all the missionaries have free access to the immigrants, and to converse with them on spiritual things. In one illustration a lady missionary has been caught by the camera in the act of handing a tract to a poor Armenian exile—a forlorn arrival, who is doubtless glad to escape from his own persecuted country. There is probably no class of immigrants arriving here at the present time, more deserving of pity and assistance than the Armenians. With the view of aiding them to employment and thus preventing them from becoming a public charge.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in a recent issue, invited those of its readers who knew of any opening for work at which the Armenian exiles could maintain themselves and possibly help distressed relatives at home, to write us, and we would endeavor acts as interpreter for the court, which tries doubtful cases. He is a Hungarian and he has been long employed in the Immigration Bureau. Besides his services in that connection, has been a cordial helper in the missionary work at the island.

It is an interesting and exciting experience to pass a few hours with the immigrants on busy steamer days. Thousands occupy the large hall at the same time, being divided off by latticed compartments. Visitors and relatives come to the island to greet the arrivals, and are permitted to go in the galleries overlooking the main floor of the large hall. It frequently happens that some friend or relative recognizing his acquaintance in the throng below, will signal to him, or in some other way communicate with him, and prompt him to evade certain questions that may be asked. This is particularly the case where some doubt exists about the immigrant being able to pass the examination. For such intermeddlers the officials are always on the lookout, and compel them to leave the building, no prompting being allowed that will enable the immigrant to mislead or misinform the officials in charge. They wait patiently until their turn comes to be interrogated by the recorders and interpreters, and, after passing the ordeal, are guided to the ticket

SAVING THE TENEMENT WAIFS.

Taken from the Sweltering City, to Find Health and Rest at Mont-Lawn—Terrible Suffering in Poverty's Homes.

FIVE hundred stricken dead by the sun in less than a fortnight, and more than thrice that number prostrated more or less seriously; hospitals overcrowded and physicians and surgeons taxed to exhaustion; undertakers never so busy with their grim duty of disposing of the dead; men, women and children dropping on the streets, victims of the relentless heat, and others perishing at home from the same pitiless cause. Such is the appalling record of August days that are without precedent in the memory of anyone now living.

How the children suffered! In the tenements, the alleys and the densely peopled courts of the East and West sides of New York, those dreadful days left a train of little victims, many dead, others dying. Happy was the child who had the good fortune to be out of the big city during those days of death. But there were thousands for whom there was no escape from the heat. Even at night, when they would seek the roof with their parents, the hot air ascended from the baking sidewalks below like the blast of a furnace. The weaker among the little ones simply wilted and died; the stronger lived to suffer and continue the fight for air that was waging all around them.

Our artist has pictured one of the incidents of the torrid spell—a tenement roof scene, taken from life. On the night upon which he made his sketch there were thousands of roofs, all over the city, where similar scenes might have been witnessed, for the suffering was universal.

It seems like taking one's life in one's hands to go down into the crowded tenement districts at this extremely heated season, now so long protracted, and yet when one thinks of the poor people that have to live in these burning alleys day and night, it becomes a delightful task, a precious privilege, to gather up the little ones and remove them to the cool, pleasant

One day, recently, when the mercury was crowding up to 100 degrees and the death rate for man and beast was being broken, our workers went down into Doyer street—an alley so narrow, crooked and dark that it seemed like a tunnel. They found the children frizzling in the noon-day sun; and here soon a party of children were quickly gotten together, cleaned up and inspected. They were all suffering from "heat-rash" or "walking measles" so broken out were they with prickly heat, yet they all "passed the doctor" satisfactorily, and under charge of the care-takers were soon on board of the Christianah. After a delightful two hours' sail, these children from Doyer, Pell and Mott streets soon found themselves on the green slopes and under the cool shade-trees of Mont-Lawn.

Nearly six hundred tenement children were taken to our Home at Mont-Lawn during the prevalence of the deadly heat in the city. They owe their escape from suffering, and possibly their lives in many cases, to the kind patrons whose gifts procured them an outing. We are especially thankful that not a single case of sickness has occurred in the Home among the hundreds of children who have been sheltered there during this very trying season. Bright eyes and ruddy cheeks testify to the benefits they have derived from their stay there.

Of late, instead of having the children go into the chapel for the evening song and prayer service, it has been held upon the

Nile Boatmen

Our illustration on the opposite is one of special interest at the present time, in view of war now going in the valley of Nile, between Anglo-Egypt troops and the M dist forces. The present struggle continuance of long series of more or less tracted, which has taken place within the last half century in that historic region. These men and fishermen seen in the photograph are evident dwellers in so peaceful districts where the terrors and alarms of have not reached ancient town on banks of the great "river of Egypt."

The Soudanese are a simple, frugal and their country may be regarded as true home of the Negro variety of mankind. The climate of the Soudan is distinctly tropical, with two well-defined seasons—hot and rainy, from April to October, and warm and dry, during the rest of the year. The rainy season is accompanied by tremendous thunder-storms and continuous rainfalls, flooding all the gorges and valleys, and raising the Nile such an extent that vast tracts of country are placed under water. The results of this inundation, after the waters retreat are seen in the rich and exuberant vegetation that springs up everywhere.

The towns and villages of the Soudan for the most part, consist of long narrow streets, excessively dirty, and bordered by mud houses or dwellings of limestone, all sizes and descriptions, but all serving the true architectural lines of Oriental buildings: flat roofs, small, narrow windows and terraces. There is an attempt at regularity in the construction of such places, and every street is more or less of a labyrinth. In all the towns a found a mixture of races—Negro, Tur Arab, Copt, Jew, the Negro predominating

They are generally in the midst of these evening exercises when the stages with the new party of children arrive; and the hundreds of children sitting there on the green grass make a very picturesque sight as they wave their hymn leaflets, like so many white wings, in greeting.

Parties of visitors frequently come to Mont-Lawn and are greatly interested in our children. A few days ago, the officers and teachers of the Brooklyn Tabernacle Sunday School visited the Home—making a company of about fifty ladies and gentlemen. With them were several clergymen, and Mr. C. C. Martin, Chief Engineer of the Brooklyn Bridge. They were entertained by the children with an impromptu concert, in which some of the young folks showed surprising vocal ability. They were also shown an exhibition of simple calisthenics under the direction of one of the care-takers, their exercises keeping graceful time to the music. The strangers ex-

OUR MAIL-BAG

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

He is one of many similar letters now reaching us by every mail:

BRIDGE, N. J., Aug. 13th, 1896.
 EDITOR, O. K. I am much pleased with the paper. I believe it is an after that comes but once a time, and many ought to avail themselves of it. I will send you the names and addresses of new subscribers within a few days.
 REV. WILLIAM JONES.

Reader, New York. 1. Would it show a lack of faith if I consulted a physician about my condition after praying the Lord to remove it? 2. In the unpardonable sin be committed in 10 days? 3. I had an evil thought once in a certain passage of Scripture and it occurred when I read it or hear it quoted. I prayed about it but the evil thought is still there. What should I do?

1. We think not. You pray to God to give you your daily bread, but you expect him to give it. The physician's advice may mean God will use to answer your prayer. 2. It is doubtful. 3. The question need not distress you. A person who has committed it would not likely to wish for forgiveness, but would be in a state of sin. 3. Many persons read a similar difficulty. A prominent clergyman in a recent second year said he would give everything he had in the world, if he could get his memory a few years read in a book when he was twenty years old. He had been a perpetual sinner to him. The best we know of would be to study the true meaning of the passage and see how to put it in a spiritual way so that the good association be in the bad.

1. Prathie, Ind. 1. Can a man be converted who does not believe in the death and resurrection of Christ? 2. Are the Apostles converted before the Crucifixion?

1. The question is too intricate. We cannot understand how such a man can be converted, but he may have a theory on the subject which might allow of his seeing saving faith. 2. Doubtless they were, or they would not have left all to follow Christ. Enlightenment came afterwards and now for service.

1. Subscriber expresses his appreciation in writing but none the less satisfactory terms:

CHAPINVILLE, N. Y., Aug. 14th, 1896.
 Received the Encyclopedia all right. It is nice, and makes a fine appearance in the house. I will do my best to get the ten subscribers soon.
 E. T. CARRINGTON.

1. Does dread of death or a fear of Christ's coming indicate that one is still outside the fold of safety? 2. After the beginning of Christ's personal reign here on earth, has there any longer for salvation?

1. To the Christian, death is not involved with terrors; he simply regards as the transition to the eternal life, the mortal putting on immortality. Moreover, far from experiencing fear or apprehension at Christ's second coming, he prays for it earnestly and devoutly desires it to be hastened. 2. We cannot limit to the grace of the Almighty. It is true that the Second Advent will be the time of bringing instant repentance and belief, multitudes of sinners, who have not had the Gospel privileges or opportunities that others have had, who wickedly rejected the Savior.

1. W. W. Walk Chalk, Pa. Who is the author of the sentence, "Cleanliness is next to Godliness?" 2. Any people think it is in the Bible, but it is not, and I have endeavored in vain to find who first used it.

1. Is an ancient Hindu proverb, and first appeared in the Beratha as the last Mishna of So (the author's name) is called.

1. Exed, Pa. Is it wrong for an unconverted person to sing in the church choir, or to sing hymns? 2. Love or praise?

1. While an unconverted person has not the same powerful incentive to praise God that a Christian has, it would be a serious mistake to exclude him on that account from a share in the praise service. That very act may be the means of bringing him nearer to God and ultimately leading him to salvation. It is to be feared that there would be a considerable diminution in many choirs if the test of conversion were rigidly applied to the members. On the other hand, it would certainly be wrong to assign to one who persistently rejects the Gospel and mocks at spiritual appeals, any special part in the service of the Lord's house, as such a course could only have a bad influence upon others.

I. M. W., Scranton, Pa. I have received from you a World-Wide Encyclopedia and have an opportunity to dispose of it at a high figure—even more than the ten subscriptions I am sending you amount to in the aggregate. If I dispose of this set, can I get another, provided I send in ten more new subscribers, or is your proposition restricted so that one person can receive only one set and no more? Kindly answer in THE MAIL-BAG, so that I may know whether I am safe in letting this set go to my friend, which I will not do unless I can be sure of another.

In view of the fact that the edition of THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is strictly limited

J. D. Penrose, Weehawken, N. J.; L. I. Manson, Dayton, O., and several others. What is meant by the terms free silver, unlimited coinage, ratio, parity of the metals, and similar terms now in use in the daily newspapers? Kindly explain in THE MAIL-BAG.

These simple definitions may help readers to an understanding of the subject now so generally discussed, viz.: the coinage question—

1. Free Coinage means that the U. S. Mints shall coin all silver bullion offered by the owners, into legal tender coins, without making any charge therefor.

2. Unlimited Coinage means coinage without limit or restriction, as to amount.

3. Ratio. The ratio of 16 to 1 means 16 grains of silver to 1 of gold; thus, a silver dollar contains 371.25 grains of pure silver besides the necessary alloy, and a gold dollar one-sixteenth of that number of grains of pure gold or 23.22 grains. The ratio was fixed in 1792 at 15 to 1, in 1834 it was changed to 16.002 to 1 and in 1837 to the present rate, 16 to 1.

4. Parity means equality of purchasing power, and this is secured by the pledge of the Government, which obligates itself to maintain silver as equal with gold for commercial use, and to accept it in payment of all dues as well as to redeem it in gold, if necessary.

L. C. Pennell, Worcester, Mass., writes as follows:

The grand premium for ten subscribers—World-Wide Encyclopedia—was thankfully received, and in due time. It is the best and greatest premium, for future reference? Or do you give them away to others who perhaps do not get much good reading? To which class do you belong? If you have not much reading matter on hand go and solicit from others who have plenty and to spare, and if you have no neighbors in want of such matter, make up a package at least once a week and take it to the County Infirmary, if one is near, and take a few to the jail and they will be appreciated by some at least. If you have Sunday School papers take them to some Mission Sunday School. Follow out this plan, and you will not only feed his lambs, but you will be able to make use of a great deal of good matter which would otherwise go to waste.

This correspondent's verdict, "Better than I expected," will be repeated by every one who receives a set of our WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA. Here is his letter:

OWEGO, N. Y., Aug. 13th, 1896.
 Gentlemen—I received the Encyclopedia in good shape, and am very much pleased with it. It is fully equal to your advertisement. The binding is better than I expected. Please accept my thanks for your very prompt shipment.

M. Wakefield, R. I. Do you not think vivisection a great sin? I do not think God, when he gave man power over the lower creation, ever intended that he should, to bring out a few points in science, subject dumb beasts to such cruel, heartless experiments.

Vivisection, except possibly in extreme cases, when the welfare of any considerable portion of the community justifies it, is a needless and inexcusable cruelty and a grievous sin. All life is sacred, and we should recognize this fact in dealing with even the lower animals. We might well take a lesson from the Hindus, who hold it a crime to deprive even the meanest insect of life, since it is something man is wholly powerless to restore.

It is agreeable though by no means surprising to receive such letters as this:

CAMBRIDGE, MD., Aug. 14, '96.
 The fifteen volumes comprising The World-Wide Encyclopedia were received in good condition on the 12th inst. I have not had an opportunity to carefully inspect the books, but am convinced, from a cursory examination of them, that they more than measure up to the standard you claim for them. To look at the volumes so nicely bound, and containing such a vast fund of valuable information, a thoughtful person could not do otherwise, than pronounce your offer a great boon to humanity. I am delighted with such a valuable addition to my library so easily obtained, and only hope that my future efforts in endeavoring to increase the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will to some extent show my appreciation.
 JOS. L. KERR.

Reader, Oak Lodge, I. T. 1. What effect do you think yellow-back novel reading will produce on a young mind? 2. Have any of our great men come from that class of young men?

1. It is deteriorating in the last degree, robbing both mind and body of their natural energy, and creating false and pernicious views of life generally, besides awakening passions and emotions of a low order. It destroys the mental taste for really good and helpful literature, and excites a morbid and dissipated craving for sensation. 2. No; the mind that has been fed on trashy literature becomes incapable of original effort in any direction. All our leading teachers and authorities hold this view.

C. B. F., South Ryegate, Vt. We think it time the Christian world rose up in its might and wiped out Mohammedanism from the face of the earth. Therefore, thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, Behold, I will feed them, even his people, with wormwood, and give them water of gall to drink. I will scatter them also among the heathen, whom neither they nor their fathers have known. And I will send a sword after them, till I have consumed them." Although these words were spoken by the Prophet Jeremiah in other years, yet is not the everlasting Father speaking in the same language to Turkey to-day?

ited and that it cannot be increased, we do not believe we would be acting justly to our subscribers were we to send any one person more than one set. Present indications are that our supply will not be sufficient to more than meet the demand. Of course we cannot object to your selling the ENCYCLOPEDIA, and we are glad you have an opportunity to get a good price for it. Ordinarily, a modern Encyclopedia, purchased in the regular way, would cost you not less than $50; whereas our subscribers have the great advantage of being able to get THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA, later and fuller than any other, and therefore more desirable, under an arrangement that makes it an absolute gift, in which we wish as many of our circle of friends as possible to share.

NORFOLK, VA., AUG. 12, 1896.
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, NEW YORK—DEAR HERALD: The Encyclopedia came to hand in good condition, and I am very much pleased. Accept thanks for the prompt attention given my order. I cannot understand how you can give so much for so little! It was about to say for nothing; for really it seems as if each volume is worth the subscription price for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

I have secured three subscriptions, for which you will please find enclosed money order for the amount. As soon as I obtain the other names I will send the same.

Subscriber, Aurora, Pa. Kindly tell me, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Mail-Bag why Japan is a more progressive country than China?

Because it has adopted modern ideas and engrafted the civilization of the Western world on the old, time-worn unprogressive system of government; whereas, China still clings to its old forms, customs, beliefs, and traditions, and opposes everything that belongs to the new or modern school.

Thus you have the fifteen dollars and the ten subscribers, to whom you will send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I have an elegant addition to my library.

Mrs. Wm. E. Exeter, Me. Will you please tell me in THE MAIL-BAG when Jerusalem was founded, and by whom?

The founding of Jerusalem, like that of many other ancient cities, seems to be almost hidden in the mists of antiquity and tradition. Josephus, the Jewish historian, (Book 7, ch. 10, of The Wars of the Jews), declares that it was built by Melchisedek, who gave it the name of Salem. There are, however, various traditions, one of which identifies it with Cadytis, a city of Syria, mentioned by Herodotus, while Tacitus and Plutarch state that the city was founded by Hierosolymus. The statement of Josephus is accepted by the early church fathers except Jerome.

E. P., Maywood, Neb. Do you think the passage referring to the inward struggle in Rom. 7: 12-25 relates to the converted or the unconverted man?

The question is disputed, but our opinion is that it describes the experience of a man newly converted who is striving to live according to the new nature imparted to him. In the last verses he learns the secret of the power of Christ, but until he learns it he is in a continual turmoil. The unconverted man does not experience the struggle, because he sins willingly.

E. E. S., Comersville, Ind., sends this excellent suggestion:

What do you do with your religious papers, periodicals, and other good reading matter when they become back numbers? Do you store them away in the attic for moth food? Do you file them away

Sudden Exit.

HERE must be something in the condition of the atmosphere to cause this widespread sudden death. When we are told it is heart-disease, that does not sufficiently explain. All death is heart-disease. In every case of departure the mainspring of life fails to perform its office. But there is an unseen sickle in the unwholesome air which is cutting down unwonted multitudes, the more conspicuous cases illustrations of the fatality on all sides. Great heat, severe cold, rapid climatic changes sweep many out of the world. Satan no doubt has much to do with the weather. What does the Bible mean when it calls him "the prince of the power of the air?" From the epidemic of suicides and murders and casualties, and the distress abroad, I have no doubt but that there are especial satanic disturbances; but the victory which Christ gained over the devil on the Temple was only a type of the Christly victory to be gained everywhere. Let us in private and public implore the reformation of the climate, and then look to see the wind turn from the east to the northwest, and dry, cool, tonic weather to follow. As the tendency of our time is to make less and less of religion amid the temporalities, we somehow feel disposed to make more and more of it. If religion is not good for this world, it will be of no value for the next. The God who is willing to save the souls of men is willing to save their bodies, and one ought to put in his hands, by especial prayer, everything that pertains to this life as well as to the coming existence.

Boys on the Limits.

IT is not a good time to be a boy. The boys now do not seem to have as good a time as we had. Whatever the occasion of celebration, it is decided that boys must not burn tar-barrels, or set off fire-crackers. It has always seemed to me an exhilarating custom that on the night of the election our cities should be illumined with boyish glee. They were not baleful fires, or ill-natured groups assembled around them. The burning pile not only expressed the joy of the victors, but lighted up the gloom of the vanquished. But the orders go forth: Out with the bonfires. So, also, the Fourth of July, which was the day for the celebration among our youth, has been despoiled, and torpedoes and fire-crackers are silenced. When fireworks are set off by a later time. Candy is pronounced poison, and pie is organized indigestion, and nothing ing in the world could induce me to be a boy again, if that were possible. I rejoice that I passed my childhood days in times and places when roar and racket were not considered outlawry. Our public men ought not to forget that they were boys themselves once. It is by rollicking fun, and old-fashioned Fourth of Julys, and election times, that our youth are to gather up exuberance for the severe duties of after-life. What are our boys to do? The amusement thought to be most appropriate for them is to get up in the morning before they are slept out, and study conic sections. Laughter must be suppressed, because it is vulgar, and boys are men at fifteen. I protest against the abbreviation of youthful joys and youthful demonstration of good cheer and patriotism. Kindle up the election fires, and rouse up the old-time Fourth of Julys, and deal out sugar-plums in reasonable quantities, and put before the wide-open, hungry mouth of boyhood an isosceles triangle of pie such as our mothers used to make for Christmas and Thanksgiving Day. It is really a serious matter, this invasion of the sportfulness of childhood. Can you tell me what are the innocent joys before the young people in our cities to-day? We say, you must not do this, and you must not do that, and you must not do the other thing. What shall they do? Church of God, go out and give some recipe for the cure of these evils, and by stating what they may do, take them off from what they may not do.

Excommunicated.

BRETHREN of the Churches, is it not time that our religious societies be cleaned of their unfaithful members? Will not the world have more respect for the Church when it is understood that there is such a thing as Christian discipline, and that a man cannot live an obnoxious life and yet sit at the communion table? Let this cleansing process go on kindly but firmly, and the Church will mean more than it does now. The greatest dangers to Christianity to-day are not those who are writing against it, but the professor of religion who carry around contribution plates and communion cups, and stand prominent at prayer-meetings, while they are known as defrauders, slanderers, or inebriates. You wonder why the old Gospel ship has such rough weather. It is because you have a Jonah on board. Pick him up and let him drop over the sides very gently, and the sea will cease its raging. It is very hard to do so, but better Jonah go to the bottom than the entire vessel. One rotten apple will spoil the whole barrel.

Commercial Ethics.

AS never before, professors of religion are trying to live one life in the street and another life in the Church, and we hear men boasting of sharpnesses in trade that are positive dishonesties—the things that twenty years ago would have been denounced everywhere, now applauded as being "smartness" in business, and as being worthy of imitation by our young men. It is impossible for a man to practise a principle of ethics in business life that is obnoxious to God, and yet live anywhere near to Jesus Christ. If a man is wrong in the street, he is wrong in the Church. I believe the Lord God is yet to walk through our commercial circles and reconstruct them and upset them. There are men all the time going down-hill in commercial life—here and there a great defalcation ringing through the land, but the vast majority of moral defalcations never reported, never coming to public observation, never denounced. And how you and I are going out in business life, and attempt the attaining of a livelihood, and be honest in our store when there is dishonesty on the right and dishonesty on the left; how we are to serve God in our company while there are fifty companies taking away our business simply because they can afford to do wrong—that is a practical question which every Christian has to meet. But do not surrender to these depressing commercial influences. With your Bible in your hand, before God make up your mind to follow it, and remember that your spiritual attainment can never be satisfactory as long as your principles of commercial ethics are rotten.

Man Overboard.

WHAT a great temptation life is, and how much we all need the grace of God, not as a dormant or half-and-half principle, but as an all-controlling influence. Nothing else is sufficient. Family pride—you see that is not strong enough to protect. Education—you see that is not a defense. Dependence of others upon our right-doing—you see that is not enough to uphold. Respectability—even that may be sacrificed. Oh, we want an ever-present God around us and within us! Let the overthrow of others lead us to no supercilious toss of the head, as though we were invulnerable, but rather let it put us on our knees with the importunate prayer, "lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." We will all either be examples or warnings—lighthouses to guide into the harbor, or buoys swung over the rocks. We want the Christ of Lydia, the seller of purple, to help us in our bargain-making; the Christ of Martha to help us in our house-keeping; the Christ of Matthew at the receipt of custom, to keep us in our official engagements; the Christ of the seven thousand in the wilderness who gathered up twelve baskets over, to help us in our economies; the Christ who opened the eyes of Bartimeus, to take care of our eyesight; the Christ who cast out the dumb spirit, to help us speak for the interests of his kingdom. Christ while we live, and Christ when we die, and Christ forever.

Forward the Church.

ONCE it was quite a protracted process to make a nail; now hundreds of nails are manufactured in a minute. The printing-press only a little while ago could make but two hundred and fifty impressions an hour; now many thousand. The mails went but once in two weeks from London to Edinburgh; now every few hours; and you must look out or you will be run over a dozen times a day by the wagon with United States mails that comes down the street to unload its tons of letters and newspapers. Has the Church advanced, developed, enlarged as rapidly as the post-office, as shipping and railroad transportation, as geology, as optics, as astronomy? Is the Church converting the world, or the world converting the Church?

A Higher Life.

HOW are we to come up to a higher style of life? Taking it for granted that we are, none of us, satisfied, I think the only way is to lay hold of Christ. I think we might put our hands on the "Rock of Ages" and clamber up that steep way. There are those who talk of the heights of Christian life as though they were Mont Blanc, a dangerous steep to ascend. A man might get up safely, but more probably would fall, and when we find a man who has come to a complete assurance of faith, and who says: "I have no more doubts about my adoption into the family of Christ than I have of my own existence," we are tempted to say: "Oh, what a brag!" We have so little grace ourselves we cannot appreciate the triumphs of grace in others. Now, my brethren, let us take it for granted that there is no height of Christian character we cannot gain. Let us struggle on with more earnestness than we have ever employed in Christ's service. First persuaded of our own wretchedness by reason of sin, before God let us cry out for his mercy until we get it.

BRIEF NOTES.

We regret to learn that some people in States have been victimized by persons pretending to be agents for this journal. It should be understood that we have no agents, and subscriptions from anyone who will, whether their own or those of other persons, would caution our friends against entrusting subscriptions to persons who are strangers.

Turkey's Rule in Crete.

RUMORS are current in European capitals that Turkey has determined to make the concessions to the Christians of Crete, which a short time ago she declared herself unable to make. The Constantinople correspondent of the New York Herald cables that at the seventh hour the Sultan resolved to make a peaceful settlement of the Cretan question, and had given Zihni Pacha a free hand in the negotiations. This result, if true, is probably due to the failure of a proposal, which was believed to have come from Russia, to have the coast of Crete blockaded by the European powers, as to prevent arms and munitions from being sent to the insurgents from Russia. England was invited to join in the blockade, but refused. Public opinion in the country demanded that the Government should lend no aid in a work that was early in the Sultan's interest, and that he should do himself if it were to be at all. Indeed, it was suggested that a blockade were established, it should include the prohibition of Turkish incursions, thus leaving the present inhabitants of the island to settle the matter by themselves. It is understood that the Cretans desire such an issue, and that they would have no fear of conflict. It is evident that Turkey has no sympathizers in Europe. The powers are disposed to allow her to deal with matters she dealt with Armenia. Nor do they appear disposed to allow Greece to occupy the island. Still less would they consent to a British occupation, though the suggestion was made in the course of the negotiations that England should become responsible for the good government of Crete and Russia should undertake the reclamation of Armenia. The more probable view at this date is that autonomy will be granted to Crete, the European powers will guarantee for its maintenance. It is clear that the atrocities in any case will not be resumed, the Sultan being evidently aware that European pressure with his misgovernment is well exhausted. Public opinion everywhere in Europe is thoroughly aroused against him, and is demanding that his power be curtailed. It seemed as if he would escape punishment for his crimes, but it would surprise no one now if he lost Crete, but other territories, as he lost Bulgaria. The advice of the Preacher is now as it did in his time:

If you see the violent perverting of judgment in a province, marvel not at the matter: for that is higher than the highest regardeth. (Eccl. 5: 8).

Nansen's Arctic Voyage.

News was received on August 14 that Dr. Nansen was safe at Vardoe, on the coast of Norway. He has been for three years beyond the confines of civilization endeavoring to reach the North Pole. Although he has not been successful in that attempt, he has come nearer to it than has any previous explorer. The Norwegian flag floats in the icy breezes that blow over the frozen solitude, nearly one hundred and fifty miles north of the point where Lockwood planted the Stars and Stripes in 1883. About two hundred and fifty miles still remain to be crossed before the North Pole is found. Dr. Nansen's story is full of interest. His scheme was to push as far north as he could in his ship and then ram it into the ice with the deliberate intention of getting frozen in. He believed that there was a drift in the Arctic sea which would carry the ship in an ice-floe across the Pole. He sailed from Christiania, June 24, 1893, in the Fram, a vessel constructed to resist the pressure of the ice. He expected to be away two years, but carried provisions for six years. Late in September he made fast to an ice-floe and the long drift northward began. It continued through the winter, but during the following summer there was a southern drift which carried the party backward. The next winter, however, brought again a northern drift, and on Christmas eve, 1894, the Fram entered a region never before visited. The northward drift continued until March, 1895, but then it began to recede as in the previous year. Nansen determined to leave the ship and explore the region to the north instead of remaining to drift southward again. Lieut. Johansen volunteered to accompany him. Leaving the Fram in the charge of Capt. Sverdrup, the two men started with sledges and dogs and two light boats. They found the travel on the ice very fatiguing, as it was not smooth but hummocky. They pressed on, however, always hoping to reach smoother ice, but on April 7

Jackson of the Windward Expedition. They returned on the Windward to Vardoe, whence the news of their safety was sent. Dr. Nansen believes that the Fram, with the other members of the expedition will come out safely and will soon be heard from at Spitzbergen. We may hope that his confidence will be justified. Too many lives have already been sacrificed in this quest. Each explorer, finds, as he penetrates farther than his predecessor, that the patriarch was right when he said: He stretcheth out the north over an empty place. (Job 26: 7).

Harmonizing Calls.

An important change in military and naval matters is announced by a Washington journal. Previous to the beginning of this month, the bugle calls by which orders are conveyed, were different in the different branches of the army and the navy. The confusion liable to arise from this variation in time of war has been often pointed out. In the event of a ship's crew taking part ashore in an attack, in co-operation with the military, they would not understand an order to advance or retire unless it were given by a naval bugler and his signal might convey to the military an order quite different from that it having reached latitude 86.14, they climbed a high hummock from which they could see a long distance ahead, and seeing nothing before them but the same kind of ice they reluctantly turned back. Their provisions were almost gone and the dog food was quite exhausted. There was no land in sight, and Dr. Nansen believes that there is no land north of the point he reached. The cold was intense, often sixty-two degrees below zero. The depth of the sea had increased suddenly above the eightieth degree of latitude. It sank from ninety fathoms to nineteen hundred fathoms, thus effectually disproving the theory of a shallow Polar basin. It was not until August 6 that the two men reached land, and they did not know what land it was. They determined, however, to find a sheltered place where they could winter. They selected a place and then set to work to prepare provisions by killing bear and walrus. They remained until May of this year and then resumed their journey southward. They hoped to reach Spitzbergen, but their maps were incorrect and they had lost their reckoning. Finally after six weeks' travel they reached the northern coast of Franz Josef Island, where they found Mr. F. G.

conveyed to the naval force. A committee of the two arms has now arranged a new code which applies to both. Each branch has a number of calls peculiar to itself, but these calls have no meaning to the other branch, while the calls common to both have the same meaning to each. We may hope that the time will yet come when all the servants of Christ, by whatever name they are called, will so reach a harmonious understanding and obedience of his voice.

The sheep follow him for they know his voice; and a stranger will they not follow; for they know not the voice of strangers. (John 10: 4, 5).

A Novel Life-Saving Station.

The mention of a life-saving station suggests a salt-stained building on a storm-swept beach with surf patrols and life boats. But a new station has been constructed which has none of these peculiarities. It is a boat which will be anchored outside the breakers. This station is the first of the kind ever constructed. She is shaped much like an old-fashioned flat iron, cut off square at the stern. The most curious feature of the boat is the "harbor" cut out of the main deck. This is an opening cut into the stern 30 feet long and 17 feet wide. It is surmounted by a walk upon which boats may be hauled. As the "station" will continually lie at her anchors and head to the wind, it follows that the egress and ingress of small boats from and into the harbor will be conducted in a sheltered place, and one of the dangerous and disagreeable features which life-saving crews have hitherto had to put up with, will be obviated. In this harbor will be moored two naphtha launches for the use of the life savers, and surf boats will hang on davits near at hand. The life-savers on board will thus be able to shelter any boat coming from a vessel in distress, or launch a boat easily and safely to go to the relief of people in peril. The new station cost seven thousand dollars exclusive of fittings. The Church may take a hint from this departure. Beautiful edifices and ornate surroundings are not of so much importance to it as a soul-saving station, as the being out beyond the breakers where it can effectually do its work.

Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, and the halt and the blind. (Luke 14: 21).

Property in a Gravestone.

An important decision rendered recently by Justice Davy of the New York Supreme Court, has caused widespread comment in the country. It was given in the suit of a citizen of New York to restrain a firm of monument-makers from desecrating a grave. The citizen, who was a member of a wealthy firm of merchants, lost his wife and daughter a few years ago. They were interred in Greenwood Cemetery, and a handsome monument was placed over their graves. It cost nearly two thousand dollars, and was paid for partly in cash and partly in notes. Before the notes came to maturity, the firm to which the purchaser belonged, suffered heavy financial losses and were obliged to suspend payment. Thereupon the monument-makers, in order to protect themselves from loss, put a lien on the tombstone. They were about to remove it and sell it at auction, when the owner interposed with a suit at equity. The monument-makers had the law on their side, Justice Davy, however, decided that the law was unconstitutional. No legislature, he said, could confer on any one the right to desecrate the graves of the dead or to disturb their remains to satisfy claims against their living relatives. This will be a satisfaction to people who depend on the monument to be erected over their graves for the perpetuation of their memory; but a better and surer way is that recommended by the Psalmist:

The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance. (Ps. 112: 6).

An American Ex-Queen.

An American lady, who has the distinction of having reigned for several years as a queen, arrived in New York a few days ago on the Lahn, of the German line. Nearly half a century ago the United States had as consul in the South Seas, Hon. Jonas Coe, of Massachusetts, who married a native lady of Samoa. Among the children of this marriage was a daughter to whom was given the name of Emma. She was sent to Melbourne, Australia, to be educated. From her father she inherited American nationality, while from her mother she inherited aristocratic rights which were recognized throughout the South Sea Archipelago. A marriage with the scion of another family enhanced her local wealth and prestige, and ultimately she succeeded to the throne of New Pomerania. After a few years her husband died, and she reigned alone. Her son received a thorough education in Australia and was sent to a European university. On his return his mother abdicated in his favor and became the wife of a German lieutenant, who resigned from the army and settled in New Pomerania. Relieved of the cares of government she accompanied her husband to his native land, where they spent several months with his relatives. She has now come to America to visit her father's family at Haverhill, Mass. Thence, after a brief stay, she and her husband intend to go to San Francisco, and from there sail for their island home. Probably few people knew that the daughter of an American citizen had been reigning as a queen; but that distinction, coveted as it is, is small compared to the illustrious position offered to all women:

I will be a Father to you and ye shall be my daughters saith the Lord Almighty (1 Cor. 6: 18).

In Venetian Homes.

Rich and Humble Dwelling Side by Side in the Queen City of the Adriatic.

ALTHOUGH Venice is essentially a city of palaces, there are nooks and by-ways within her borders where poverty dwells in the shadow of wealth. Our illustration affords a view of such a quarter, where the inhabitants are of the bourgeois class—gondoliers, small tradesmen, shop-keepers and laborers. It is a city famous for its beautiful women, and even among the very poor, there is a picturesque gracefulness and poise of figure that are hardly equalled in any other city in Europe. For many centuries, the line that divides the classes has been rigidly drawn and the poor have little in common with the rich, upon whom they are dependent for a livelihood. Their homes are little better than damp and dingy hovels, in narrow, gloomy streets; tall, old-fashioned buildings that have sheltered generation after generation of lowly workers, whose ambition rarely rises beyond the possession of a black-painted gondola or passenger-boat, and a few simple pieces of household furniture. They are a plain-living, frugal, earnest people, with few pleasures at their command, and no luxuries.

Very different are the lives of those who occupy the splendid buildings that once were the homes of the doges and princes of Venice. The city is divided into two great sections by the Grand Canal, which winds tortuously through it, and is intersected by 146 smaller canals. These serve the purpose of streets, and are spanned at short intervals by bridges, of which there are 306 in all. Venice has been picturesquely described by the poet Rogers:

There is a glorious city in the sea,
The sea is to be found in the narrow streets,
Ebbing and flowing; and the salt sea-weed
Clings to the entrance of her palaces.
No track of men, no footsteps to and fro,
Lead to her gates: the path lies o'er the sea.

Saint Mark's Square, one of the finest in Europe, is a favorite resort for those who visit Venice. Three sides of it are enclosed by shops and cafes, while the famous Cathedral of St. Mark occupies the other. These shops are filled with the daintiest wares and productions of Venetian workmanship, and shoppers find them a paradise. Besides, there are the famous show-places: the Cathedral itself, with its four sculptured horses of bronze over the entrance; the equestrian statues in various parts of the city; the grand Church of Santa Maria Gloriosa della Frati; the Doge's Palace which has been five times destroyed and rebuilt; the Giant's Stairway, with its colossal statues; the Ponte Rialto—the principal bridge in Venice—and its double flight of stone steps; the Pesaro, Ca'd'Oro, and Manin palaces, and many other world-renowned works of art to claim attention. Historically, few cities have equal claims upon the student and the stranger.

In Venice, Galileo invented the telescope; the first Bible, the first editions of the classics, and also the first newspaper, were each issued from Venetian presses. Here artillery was first brought into practical use. The oldest clock in the world preserved there is the oldest in the world. Here Titian, the painter, Tintoretto, the carver, the world-renowned Canova, and many other great artists were born and lived. And here also, banking and bills of exchange were invented and first used in commercial life.

There is but little change in the ancient city in the passing of the centuries and the Venice of to-day presents, in many respects, the same aspect as in the days of the Doges. But its naval greatness, its commercial supremacy and all but the wondrous glory of its art, have departed forever.

A Novel Custom.

Babies' "birth-cards" are a recent innovation. In sending announcement cards of a baby's birth the baby's name is printed in full on a small card which is enclosed with the parents' card. If desired, it may be attached to the larger card by a bow of very narrow white satin ribbon, or silver room when friends drop in at five o'clock. When no maid is present, she helps the guests to the sandwiches and cakes, and herself hands the cups, and takes them from the guest who would like to be relieved.

A Strange Wedding Anniversary.

One of the most singular "Golden Weddings" ever known, was recently celebrated in Switzerland. Christian Almer is a famous Grindelwald guide, and he and his faithful wife celebrated their wedding anniversary at the top of the Wetterhorn. Christian is seventy-three and his wife only a few years his junior, but notwithstanding their old age, they are as brave and vigorous as many persons of forty. On the day before the anniversary, it rained heavily, but the courageous pair, accompanied by their two sons, Hans and Peter, and Dr. Huber, dared the journey. In three-and-a-half hours they reached the Gieckstein hut, and spent a day there in warm and brilliant weather. Many were the eyes that looked up at them that day from Grindelwald through field-glasses. At 6.30 next morning they were on the

A Daughter's Part.

One of the most acceptable things a girl can do is to receive friends graciously, particularly at home. In one's own house a cordial manner is peculiarly fitting. Do not stand off in the middle of the room, (says a writer, who is an authority on the subject), and bow coldly and formally to the friend who has called; walk over to meet her; give her your hand, and say pleasantly that you are very glad to see her again. Stiff, cold and formal ways of greeting acquaintances are not proper in a girl welcoming guests to her father's house. A daughter's part is to assist her mother on every social occasion. The girl pours the tea in her mother's drawing-top of the Wetterhorn, whose summit the bridegroom forty-two years previously had adorned with a little fir tree, which has since become famous in the annals of Alpine climbing. In the evening they arrived at Grindelwald, where they were given a hearty reception. Frau Almer has the distinction of being the first woman of over seventy who has climbed to the top of the Wetterhorn.

They all get most good out of the Bible, however, if we remember a few things about who are sometimes forgotten. One of these is that there is a progressive revelation. In communicating his message to men, God dealt with men in steps with children. The Bible is progressive, not the earlier ones he dealt with the child race. There are many things they did not understand; there are many things they did not see as offensive to God, which we not reproved. The Bible says, God winked at them, as we sometimes say of a judicious parent or teacher, who closed his eyes to wrongdoing which was afterwards corrected. When Christ preached his sermon on the Mount he reiterated the words, which had been said . . . "I say unto you . . ." repeating, thus, words that we find in the Old Testament. The Bible had arrived when we were to pass into a higher level of education. Yet there are still people who attach importance to the passages thus made obsolete.

important also to realize that there are expressions in the Bible which are in its spirit and to God's glory. These are not to be taken out of their context and were not intended to be. A case in point is the expression in Job 2: 4, "For his skin, yea all that a man hath will he give for his life." It is in the Bible and is often quoted as a Biblical expression. Yet a glance at the context shows that it is representative of the attitude of the man as being uttered by him. So with other passages in the Bible. Ecclesiastes, Canticles and other books of dramatic character. The characters are representative of saying things which are true and are as far from being the words the Jews used (John 8 : 48) to say: "Thou hast a devil," as such passages, divorced from their context, and used them as they are in the catechisms.

at the most good out of the Bible it is necessary to realize that it was not intended to teach science or politics but religion. Each book should be read as a whole and the purpose and intent of the writer ascertained, and as much as possible sound out of the circumstances of the time for whom it was written. When we are running into error, they need to hear the truth opposed to that particular error and, so an emphasis was laid on that which gives it in the Bible a prominence which it no longer deserves. It is, therefore, necessary to get the spirit of the writers and to find out the general principles on which they based their utterances so that we can apply to our case.

Christ's Own Prophecies.

The Course of the Church's History Between the First and Second Advents.

BY REV. GEO. H. PEMBER, M.A.*

On the very day in which our Lord announced the rejection of the Jews he proceeded to unfold the mystery which had been hidden from the ages, and to foretell in parables what should befall the people of God during the interval between the Sixty-ninth and Seventieth of Daniel's weeks.

That his discourse contained an entirely new revelation, we are informed by the Evangelist who observes that, in delivering it, Christ fulfilled the prophecy; "I will open my mouth in parables; I will utter things hidden from the foundation of the world. Indeed, we are more than once reminded in the New Testament that the purpose of God in regard to the Church and the heavenly calling had been kept secret, until the Lord himself disclosed it. Thus the Seven Parables were similitudes of the Kingdom of the Heavens intended to foreshadow the varying conditions under which those who shall hereafter reign with Christ have, and are still being, gathered out of the present age. And the main burden of the prediction was that this body would, during its stay upon earth, be continually liable to become clogged and corrupted by admixtures of evil; that it would be interpenetrated surrounded, and even altogether concealed by a far greater multitude who would profess to belong to it, while they were in reality the children of the Wicked One.

The prophecy is, therefore, concerned with the whole number of nominal believers throughout the world, with every Church or sect which professes to derive its doctrines from the Word of God, and in any way acknowledges his Son, Jesus Christ. This vast and motley crowd spreads over the whole extent of Christendom in the largest sense of the term ; while here and there in the midst of it, and ever acting more or less as a check upon the corruption around them, stand the scattered children of God, unable to extricate themselves from the press, and destined to continue unable, until heaven shall ring with the cry: "Gather my saints together, those who have made a covenant with me by sacrifice!"

Now the whole of this great mixed multitude or Christendom is, for time, called the Kingdom of the Heavens, because it holds within it—the true heirs of the Kingdom. Hence, each of the Seven Parables appears to foreshadow some characteristic of the nominal Church especially promiment at a particular time. And they seem to be arranged in chronological order; for, to pass by details they begin with the sowing, or first preaching, of the Word, and end with the separation of good and evil at the close of the dispensation.

Yet, although they indicate the true succession of the phases which they represent, it does not, of course, necessarily follow that the period of one Parable must be completely ended before another commences; on the contrary, it may overlap, and be contemporaneous with that which follows it. The seven Parables cover the whole period like the scenes of a panorama and they bear a close and intimate resemblance to that other seven—the epistles to the churches which John received.

CHAPTER IV.

The Way of the Transgression.

WHEN George Browne and the Irish boys heard the splash of Milton's fall and his cry for help, they concluded that they would not have his company, and that they had better get away from the scene as quickly as they could. George touched the mare with the whip, and in a few moments they were en route for Chestnut Hill, where the Irish boys were to be dropped, to pursue the remainder of their journey on foot.

As usual, however, things did not turn out just as George intended. They had not proceeded more than five or six miles when, as they passed through a small village, they heard the sound of a violin and other unusual noises, coming from a small house, from the door knob of which black crape was flowing.

"Be jabbers, Ted," said Mullin, "Loon's cousin lives here, and they are having a wake over his old granny. Git out, my b'ys, and have a turn."

George Browne knew nothing of wakes, but his curiosity was stronger than his fear, and, tying the old mare to the nearest tree, they all went in, Mullin leading the way, and introducing George as "the son of his boss."

There in a plain coffin, lay an aged woman cold and stiff in death, with a smoking dip candle burning at her head, while all around were her former friends and relatives, young and old; laughing, crying, praying, swearing, drinking whiskey, and smoking pipes; while in the adjoining room, small and cramped as it was, a dozen or more young men and boys were listening to the music of an old, cracked fiddle, and getting ready to have a dance.

"Mullin, ye spalpeen, we all be so dhry; ye must stand treat," said a bright, red-faced daughter of Erin.

"And sure, I'm the b'y for yese," boastingly said Mullin, taking out of his pocket the small change given to him by Milton and Browne. The younger Fenian was despatched for two more quarts of "old Irish rye whiskey," as it was called by courtesy. As a matter of fact, it had been distilled from sour molasses and kitchen slops, at the distillery a few furlongs off.

They all took a good round smack of it without water, shutting their eyes as they swallowed it, because the oil of vitrol and strychnine used in its distillation gave it a decidedly sharp taste, even to throats that were well greased with the "critter."

George Browne began to feel uncomfortable, as eleven o'clock struck, and to wish he was somewhere else. One of the buxom Irish lasses seem to anticipate his dilemma, so she said:

"Nivver a dhrop has the pale-faced lad taken; I guess he's afeard his mammy will whack him."

Upon which Mullin said, with a flourish of his glass:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I propose the health of my friend, Mistor Brown; may he live long to eat water-millions, and die happy!"

This raised a big laugh at George's expense, and, as above all things, a boy most hates to be ridiculed, when they sprang to their feet to drink the next toast, George could not resist, and drank off, with a cough, a glass of very bad whiskey and water. He privately excused himself, and reasoned that, as he had been doing so badly all day, it was impossible to do much worse, and, being as drunk as a lord, he might as well "make a day of it," and end the matter.

Twelve o'clock found Mullin and O'Rourke quite intoxicated, and fast asleep on the floor, as indeed were several others, and George, thinking it a good time to get away, watched until all who were likely to hinder him were out of the way, or asleep, and boldly pushed through the room where the corpse was lying, to the road. In passing the coffin, he noticed that somebody, with more whiskey in his head than sorrow in his heart, and forgetting the usual respect paid to their dead by the Irish, had put a dirty clay pipe in the mouth of the corpse, giving to the usual solemn appearance of the dead a most ludicrous and absurd appearance, which filled Browne's mind with horror. He found his head aching and reeling, too; still the mare knew the way home, if he did not, and soon she was trotting along the hard turnpike road, homeward bound.

Little Carrie Walter was so agitated at the mishap to Milton that she could not sleep, and lay in a nervous state for hours after retiring. Neither she nor her father knew then who had taken the mare. She felt sure, as she told her father, that Milton "never would steal;" and to confirm it, she determined to lie awake and see if anybody did not return the stolen property. After being disturbed by several false alarms, Carrie heard the well known jog trot of the old mare coming up the avenue. Her father also apparently heard the sound, for he called for his servant, and both dressed themselves and went down stairs.

The drive in the night air had not sobered the lad but seemed rather to have stimulated the effects of the whiskey to which he was, of course, unaccustomed. He was singing hilariously and he drove boldly up to the front door of his uncle's house, reckless of the plans he and Milton had arranged to secure secrecy.

"John," he shouted to his uncle's hostler, "I say, John,—hic—come down here quick; mare and wagon's got into the water-wheel, I believe, and the mill's exploded or something,—hic—John, this wagon's spinning 'round awful."

Mr. Walter and the man were quickly on the scene, and the former, reaching into the wagon and taking the inmate by the collar, pulled him out without much ceremony, and shook him violently, not knowing who it was.

"Easy there—hic—Uncle Archy, can't you give a fellow suthin' to drink, or some water melons?"

Mr. Walter was astonished to find the horse thief to be his own nephew; and was shocked at his condition; a mere boy, and yet drunk! Taking him to the library, he roughly pushed him in and locked the door, leaving him to find the sofa in the dark; and then retired to his chamber, thoroughly disgusted. George slept soundly till nearly noon the next day, when, awaking, the night debauch came before his mind like a fearful nightmare, and he realized, not only his sinful conduct, but his present awkward position; imprisoned in his rich uncle's library. Finding no way of escape, he knocked at the door, and in the absence of Mr. Walter, he was answered by little Carrie, whose eyes were swollen with weeping.

"Cousin Carrie, I am very sick; is Uncle Archy at home?"

"O George, how could you be so naughty? How could you take Papa's horse and leave Milton to drown in the water?"

"Why, cousin, did—did Milton get drowned?" gasped out Browne, the disappearance of his friend on the previous evening now appearing in a new light; his courage, too, was breaking down. He became pale, trembled violently, and wished for escape from his predicament, as the cold sweat formed on his forehead.

"Was Milton drowned?" he asked, in dread of the answer.

"Nearly so, but Papa fished him out and sent him home," replied Carrie.

"Carrie, does my mother know about what I have done?" inquired the youth.

"She came here at five o'clock this morning, in great distress, to inquire if we knew anything about you, and papa, who was very angry, unlocked the library door and showed you to her, and—"

"Oh! God forgive me, cousin, I cannot stand this,"—George snatched up his cap and rushed out of the house, paying no attention to the cries of his mother, who saw him from a window and implored him to return.

As he approached the entrance to the Walter estate, he saw Mr. Plummer and Mr. Walter turn in from the lane, in the latter's buggy, and, George, who a day before had courage to face any mortal man, now hid away in the bushes, afraid to see them; fleeing even when no one was pursuing. He walked rapidly toward Mrs. Seymour's house, to ascertain whether Milton was dead or alive, and, to try to induce him to run away, go to sea, and escape the consequences of their disgrace.

"There's no other hope," soliloquized George in his flight. "This thing will be talked about all over the neighborhood and ruin our characters. Once at sea, we can do as we please and there will be no one to interfere with us. Perhaps we shall get rich and then we can come back to Brookdale and no one will remember this escapade against us." Poor George had read of the romance of a sailor boy's life, but knew nothing of its hardships.

Meanwhile, Mr. Walter and Mr. Plummer were discussing what course should be taken with the two wicked boys. Mr. Walter had sought Mr. Plummer early on Monday morning to get his views about the events of the past evening, as both George Browne and Milton Seymour were in Mr. Plummer's class in the Brookdale Sunday School.

Mr. Walter, not knowing positively that there was any connection between the acts of stealing his melons and running off with his horse, did not include his nephew, George Browne, in his denunciation of "that young scamp," Milton Seymour.

"I feel very sorry, Walter, that this thing has occurred, both for the boy's sake and for his mother's," said Mr. Plummer, who was interrupted by:

"I tell you, Plummer, his mother ought to have brought him up better. Boys don't act in that way if they are properly trained. He and his mother are a curious couple, and while I will not proceed criminally against the young rascal, I must get you, at least, to take him in hand."

"That I will; but, my brother, I cannot agree with you about training. I have had too much experience of boys and I have seen the best trained boys go wrong. Why, look at your own nephew, I hear he is in the same scrape, and, if anything, deserves more punishment, because he is two years older than Milton; so be careful how you talk about a criminal prosecution."

"Who said my nephew was implicated?" demanded Mr. Walter, excitedly.

"I say so; for I saw him driving your mare along the road in a way that convinced me he had been drinking. He was 'hurrahing for Carrie Walter, and Fenian Hill,' and other things, persons, and places. Besides, I had the whole matter from Mrs. Seymour. Her son told her all he knew."

This gave Mr. Walter considerable uneasiness, which was increased, when he learned that George had left the house in an excited state of mind. So, after walking the floor for a few minutes, Mr. Walter broke the silence:

"Perhaps, after all, Plummer, we had better suppress this thing, and use our private efforts to reform the youngsters."

"That is my plan, sir, especially for the sake of their poor, heart-stricken mothers. It is a great trial for the boys to pass through, but what must it be to the widowed women to whom they are so dear. All their hopes are centred on their boys."

Thus being finally agreed to, Mr. Plummer continued: "The truth is, Walter, this trouble, and other difficulties which have occurred, have all risen from the low state of religion among us. When the professed followers of Christ neglect their religious duties at home, omit to worship God in his courts, fail to walk as becomes children of light, and live on so low a plane, that spectators cannot tell who are Christians and who are worldlings; depend upon it, there is a big screw loose somewhere. While this state of affairs lasts, the children around us will be in practical unbelief, and will have no religious principle to enable them to stand temptation."

"Yes, I know," said Mr. Walter, "I believe the trouble began in the church, are not what we ought to be."

"Well, sir," Mr. Plummer replied, "ought to change, otherwise we will have more trouble of the same kind worse. I will tell you what I have been thinking: I love our pastor, good Jones, and am benefited by his preaching, but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that his labors fail to meet the requirements of our members, whose numbers are decreasing, and whose numbers decrease more than that he does not command the attention of the youth, who either neglect the church, or go off frolicking to the other end of Sunday evenings, receiving no benefit."

"Then, Plummer, you favor Dismal removal?"

"I am not prepared to say that, but I do say that we must set a higher standard of piety, or our church will be ruined, and our youth will be lost. We propose to call a meeting of the church and congregation to consider the best to be done, and I want you to be present and promise to be present."

"I will do both," replied Mr. Walter.

"Thank you," said Mr. Plummer, "I want to have the matter arranged by you. It is liable to be misunderstood by Jones has many friends, and I do not want to hurt their feelings nor his, but must not sacrifice the interests of the church to our sentiments. I am concerned about our young people. We must have a young man who will win their hearts. If we do not, we shall lose other members likely to lose your nephew and Milton Seymour. Now I will go and leave the two lads. I must save them if I can."

Mr. Plummer shook hands with his friend, and hurried off to see Mrs. Seymour. He learned from her that George Browne had been there, but she could not let him see her boy was sleeping, after his night. Besides, she did not wish the two boys come together just at that time. She had talked with George, but found him sullen, and he had got angry because he was not allowed to see Milton.

"Where did he go?" Mr. Plummer asked.

Mrs. Seymour could not tell. She would not listen to her reproof. He would feel his disgrace, but was not reproached.

Mr. Plummer searched the town, but could find no trace of the boy. Night came and still he was not found. He grew anxious, and his mother was distracted.

Day after day passed, and there were no tidings of him. His mother feared he had committed suicide. She grew hysterical and blamed his uncle, and Mrs. Seymour and Mr. Plummer. If they had been to him her boy would have lived. She was sure he was dead. He was the bottom of some river.

But one morning all this hysteria came to an end. Little Carrie received mail from Halifax, N. S., a letter from her boy. George had gone to sea, he said.

"I could not bear to stay in Brookdale where everybody would laugh at getting tipsy, so I have shipped on an Irish barque for three years. I am around the world and I expect to see good many wonderful things. I shall come back home, and try to comfort to my mother. I want you to pardon me for getting into such a trouble, for it was all my fault. You must kiss my mother for me, and her not to grieve for me; that I will be good, although I confess there is wickedness on this ship, even worse I saw at home. And when you hope, my dear good little cousin, I love so much, that you will never to pray for one who needs it."

Your Affectionate Cousin, GEORGE. Carrie carried the boyish letter to George's mother without loss of time, relieved her of her sorrow. She was childless, as she had feared. But it was her very anxiety. She was afraid George would be ill-used, that he would not get proper food, that he would be drowned and she conjured up a host of fancies. Walter told her hardship would do him good, but she would not be comforted.

Bit of Woods.

LANGDON AYLWARD was, as usual in the morning, hurrying to catch a train. Suburban residents who do business in town know how much may hang on a single minute, how often interests are imperilled because a tardy, how despairingly one looks at a car disappearing at the far end of a station when one arrives there an instant late. But with his hand on the door, his eager haste to be gone, he stopped as a horse stops which is suddenly, stopped and stood and waited. His motherless little daughter, Madge, was trotting down the path after him, with a bunch of flowers in her small hand. "Give me my flowers wiv' oo, Popsy," she called in baby language. He looked them up, he caught them, and was off, and fortunately, not in time for his train. "Oh, shave, Langdon," said a friend, "don't go to allow yourself more trouble. But what have you there? Daisies and buttercups? How sweet! Give me back my old home in Vermont, my mother, she was so fond of those things." "Oh, known among men as a hard, unscrupulous fighter in the rough and struggling business world, the fragile little fresh bouquet was growing misty and tender. He reached his office there was a note in his button-hole, and the clerk served it with amusement in their eyes. Though they did not suspect it, the woods saved them many words that day, and came between employer and a transaction in which he meant to take a hand, holding him in his narrow path of straightness and rectitude. Not for years had he thought of his mother so often nor had he heard words of counsel so plain. That summer day, won by the old withered buttercup.

Langdon Aylward's way down-town was a cable car. It was crowded, and he hung on by a strap. In the jostling out, he dropped the baby's card, and was sorry, but he consoled himself with the reflection that the darling knew nothing about it.

"I waited for them;—little ones always likes to send me off with the benediction just as her angel father used to," he thought, his heart full of yearning for the "tender old day that was dead." Then he claimed his attention, and Madge stood on the background. To my thinking, there is something very beautiful in the vision of loving which husbands and wives have. You see that mechanic working with his tools for a long day's labor toiling in the heat or cold, that lawyer bending over his desk, that merchant buying and selling in the mart. Each of these men in his department, working hard for his family, the earnings which he personally brings in; he spends his strength for his family. But he does not talk about his family, nor proclaim his love from the street; he just loves them, and his love is the motive power which moves him on in his life. Ever his back to everything else, and so, when I say it, God loves his world, he is always back of the Divine purpose, back of the movements of the universe, the great heart of the Father.

He returned to Langdon's lost wild life. They were picked up by a ragged old man, who looked fiercely in her grimy hands, and off in triumph to her home. It was a poor place, one dingy room on the top floor of a swarming tenement, where the father and mother were quarreling bitterly at the moment Norah entered. The father was out of work, and had gotten to the point of utter discouragement. He had walked the streets day after day, looking for a job, but looking in vain. Now, he had arrived at the stage when a man feels ashamed to be seen idling in the streets when his neighbors have employment, and his wife, worn out with her share of the situation, was venting her ill temper on it and her husband, and relieving her nervousness with bitter words. The scene is a sadly familiar one in the homes of poverty, and out of it grow black and menacing storms, sometimes ending in murder, or in suicide.

John Mahoney was generally a patient man, but Bridget's reproaches were maddening, and he had picked up his battered old hat, and was desperately rushing to the door, when Norah came flying in.

WILBERFORCE'S HOME IN HULL, ENGLAND.

"Oh, daddy! oh, mammy!" she cried, "stop talking and look here. Flowers out of the woods, regular fresh-air flowers, such as I found last summer when I went with the children 'way off to the big, green country!"

The child's earnestness arrested both parents. They were country born and bred, and the wild flowers appealed to them, as no garden beauties could.

John threw down his hat. "Look at me, lass!" he said to his wife. "I'll stop for a job in my trade, and I'll seek work in the country. Men are wanted now on the farms; I'll go anywhere, for any wages, but I'll be idle no longer."

"It's me that has the bad tongue, John, my boy," said Bridget, with quick recognition of his changed mood; "forgive me, will ye, dear. Maybe we could both get work in the country. I can milk a cow, and make butter, and it would be good for the child, to get out of this."

The very poor have, as a rule, a dislike to leave the city. Some instinct of gregariousness makes them cling to the herd, to the streets they know, to the excitement of the town. Both John and Bridget would yesterday have scorned the thought of taking places on a farm, and "a gentleman's place" where a man and his wife could be employed together, presented no temptations. But, lured by the spell of a few fading violets and by the hand of God, which touched their hearts, they changed their minds. John mounted the steps of an intelligence office and humbly asked for any open position there might be. By nightfall he and his family were on board a boat on their way to a farmstead on Long Island. Here, John's knack for carpentry and his turn for handling tools, supplemented his knowledge of farm-work, and he was soon regarded as a valuable man by his employer. The family had a neat little house to themselves. Bridget looked after a dairy, and Norah forgot street slang, and grew sweet, and brown and rosy, as a child should be.

Suppose that Aylward had not waited that hurried morning for his little daughter's flowers? What then? How much good would have been frustrated; how much evil helped along. God meant that bit of the woods to be his own messenger, by whatsoever hands he sent it.

The Home of Wilberforce.

THE town of Hull, in England, is about to lose a building that has become very dear to many of its people, and indeed to many in other parts of the world—the home of William Wilberforce, the great anti-Slavery orator. It is shortly to be demolished to make room for some new public buildings. This historic house is shown in an illustration on this page. William Wilberforce was born in Hull, August 24, 1768. After finishing his college course he was elected to Parliament, and served with much distinction. It was not until 1784, however, that the real work of his life began. He made a tour on the Continent during 1784-85 with Mr. Pitt and the Rev. Isaac Milner, whose influence, coupled with the reading of the New Testament and Doddridge's Rise and Progress, awakened in him serious impressions, and fixed in him the determination to devote his life to God and humanity. On his return to England he began to devote himself to all reforms which opportunity permitted. But in 1787 he began a series of efforts for the reformation of manners, the suppression of vice and immorality, and especially for the abolition of the African slave trade. He opened the debate against the traffic in May, 1789, and, during all the period that followed until the accomplishment of this great result, never lost sight of the one object of his public career.

A Famous Pastor Dead.

The Church of Christ has suffered a loss in the Death of Rev. George W. Samson, D.D., LL.D., formerly President of Columbia University, Washington, D. C., and of Rutgers Female College, New York. Dr. Samson was an able and earnest scholar whose influence has done much for the training of young men and women in Christian scholarship. He was seventy-seven years of age.

Publisher's Announcements.

NO more orders can be filled for copies of Helps to the Study of the Bible, our entire stock being exhausted.

Vacations are well-nigh over, and schools, colleges, and similar institutions throughout the country, will shortly reopen. It would be one of the greatest helps to a young man or woman, either in their student or home lives, to become the possessor of a set of The World-Wide Encyclopedia. Indeed, with such an aid at hand, a student might be said to be fully equipped for all contingencies, educational, controversial, or otherwise. Each of these encyclopedia sets, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is enabled to offer its readers on the easiest terms imaginable, forms a complete library in itself, and opens avenues of information to the possessor, such as could not be secured, were he the owner of any number of ordinarily selected books. Each set contains 15 large volumes, the whole aggregating some 7,000 pages, and weighing 40 pounds. The encyclopedia is copiously illustrated and contains 96 colored maps, comprehensive articles on every topic in the range of History, Geography, Science, Art, Travel, Literature, &c. The Encyclopedia is not to be sold for cash, under any circumstances. The only way is by securing TEN NEW (no premium) subscribers for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at $1.50 each. This does not mean renewals, or the substitution of one member of a family for another now on our books. Send $5 now and the set will be sent to you; then make your canvass, get your subscribers and send them to us, first deducting the $5 previously forwarded.

Letters from several inquirers during the week justify us in again calling attention to the necessity for those who desire to secure any of the slightly damaged Libraries, sending in their orders soon. These Premium Libraries, each consisting of a full set of ten books, are absolutely perfect, except that some cases have been slightly rubbed in packing—not, however, to any visible extent, or so as to mar their appearance. The books themselves are in perfect condition, of course, and the few scratches that appear on the cases do not in any way interfere with the value of the set as a whole. We have put the damaged sets aside and will send them to such of our readers as wish them at $1.50 per set, expressage prepaid. This is an excellent chance to procure a capital home library at a ridiculously low figure, indeed less than one-half its value. The whole to volumes, which comprise fully 3,000 pages, are as follows:

1. Around the Tea-Table.....T. DeWitt Talmage.
2. Book of Golden Deeds.....Charlotte M. Yonge.
3. Readings and Recitations.....Fennie.
4. Golden Treasury.....Bogatzky.
5. The Children's Portion.....Shoppell.
6. How to Get On in the World.....Cathoun.
7. Capital Stories by Am. Authors.....Hawthorne.
8. American Citizens' Handbook.....Maine.
9. A Budget of Christmas Tales.....Charles Dickens.
10. Parlor Amusements and Etiquette.....Sandison.

Our stock of Gospel Hymn Books is rapidly dwindling, but an opportunity still remains for such Churches and Sunday Schools as desire to have a new equipment of "Gospel Hymns, Numbers 1 to 6, Consolidated, Music Edition," to get a very good bargain by writing us promptly. We have a limited number of copies—a very small percentage of the original 50,000—which have been rubbed in packing but are otherwise all right, and these we are willing to sacrifice in lots at a figure that must prove attractive.

The Sultan and his advisers are still thrilling Europe with their atrocities, not only in Armenia, but in Crete, Macedonia and Mesopotamia. This phenomenal persecution of Christians is one concerning which every reader of this journal should be well informed, and the Rev. F. D. Greene's copiously illustrated and ably written work, The Rule of the Turk, presents the whole ghastly story of Mohammedan savagery and barbarism, holding nothing back. The regular publication price of the book is 50 cents, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will supply its readers, who order promptly, with copies at 25 cents each, expressage prepaid. This offer will be positively withdrawn September 1, when the price will be restored to 50 cents.

Harvest time is approaching in Palestine. The olive trees are in full bearing, and on the hillsides and in the valleys "round about Jerusalem," preparations are being made to gather the fruit. Those olive trees are pruned every year, and some time ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was so fortunate as to secure, from the orchards of Bethlehem and Olivet, a number of sections of the olive trees removed in pruning. These sections, which are of the size of a brick, and are of a deep, rich color of the natural wood, slabs have already been sent to very many of our readers, who highly appreciate them. Each slab is marked with the words "HOLY SCRIPTURES," "City of Peace." We will forward slabs to any reader in any part of the country at twenty-five cents each, postage prepaid. They make an elegant desk or mantel ornament, besides being priceless as a souvenir.

THE IMMORTAL LIFE.*

THE "profit and loss" of life is real or fictitious, according to our standard. If death ends all, life is all a loss. It would then endure its hardships, carry its burdens, and pass away with no satisfaction to itself. It would endure hard struggles in commercial or other directions, and die unsatisfied. It would deny itself for the children, only to leave them forever. It would stand by the bedside of the idolized child, and turn away from the beautiful, though lifeless form, without one ray of hope. If there were no continuation of life independent of this physical body, it would not be worth living.

The conviction of the immortal life changes our estimate of everything. It impels hope. The poor anticipate a blessing of seeming inequalities. Sufferers speak of a world where there is no pain; where they never say, "I am sick," where there is no hunger nor thirst. In such a hope and conviction the dying assure us we shall meet again. The added years do not bring dismay. The weary and the aged speak complacently of laying down their burdens for the burdenless existence.

Man is pre-eminently an immortal being dwelling for his earthly life in material form. We who briefly deal with material affairs are to live on when the last of earth has come.

Within every one dwells this undying desire for an undying life; but after the most has been said, the history of human life is equally the history of death. There has always been a shrinking from the great change. It has made the gloom of Egypt deeper; it has put out the light of Athens; it has darkened the snowy summit of Olympus; it has bated the breath of men professing no timidity. Men have feared the Hannibals of history, but they have feared death more. They have shivered within sound of Alva's sword, but have preferred a life amid cruelties rather than a silence in death. With all the strength of hope there lingers yet in every human breast a shrinking which the power of God alone can remedy.

Our exalted conception of the immortal life makes even the legitimate affairs of this life seem tawdry and gross. How would an angel look counting money? We should doubt him as an angel. How would Gabriel appear giving his angelic attention to organizing a "trust"? The quaint dreamer pictures earthly things as refuse gathered with muck-rakes. In themselves, all these are worthless beyond the limitations of earth. As inhabitants of the earth, however, we have to do with them. All are valuable in their place. Yet, if the loss come, shall the immortal mourn? When bank-stocks grow less in value, shall this immortal imagine that God is leaving his throne? When knaves destroy his credit, shall he think that God's promise is failing? The wealth of a Rothschild is not of as much value to an immortal spirit as are our old broken playthings of childhood valuable to us. Who can imagine one of the redeemed sighing to come back to earth to take up a few mortgages? None could suggest any comparison between the mansion Christ has prepared and the mansion left behind on earth. We are to use these things as not abusing them; but we shall take none away with us. Why not, then, treat them at their worth, or worthlessness?

The conviction of immortality reminds us we shall meet again. We cannot sorrow as those who have no hope. Life is not ended with the last breath. The future claims the thoughts of the silent chamber. The immortal hope reaches forward. What else could give the needed consolation?

A Noble Southern Matron.*

THE last public appearance of Mrs. Eliza Pinckney was one in which she must have taken great delight. It was when in 1791 General Washington, on his southern tour, stopped to breakfast at Hampton. The General left Georgetown early, and, traveling with four horses, reached Hampton on the South Santee by eleven, having crossed three large rivers in the fifteen-mile drive. He was accompanied by Major Pinckney and several other gentlemen, and turned aside about a mile from the high road to breakfast with the ladies. He was received by Mrs. Horry, with her mother on the one hand, her daughter on the other, and her nieces around her, under the handsome new portico with lofty columns which she had just added to the house.

The ladies were arrayed in sashes and bandeaux painted with the General's portrait and mottoes of welcome; and after a stately reception he was led to the large assembly-room, just built, where an elaborate breakfast awaited him, the gentlemen of his suite, and many of the neighbors, who had gathered to greet him. Before leaving, he observed a handsome young oak growing rather too near the house, which Mrs. Horry proposed to cut down, as it interfered with the view. The General advised that it should be kept, as an oak was a thing no man could make; and there it still stands—"Washington's Oak" unto this day.

General Washington himself, at his own request, acted as one of her pall-bearers. No account of Mrs. Pinckney would be complete without some notice of the result of her life-work. She had spared no sacrifice or pain to train the young minds given to her care, and she was greatly rewarded. The services of her sons to their country continued with their lives. They were chosen by Washington himself for important offices, and performed them well,—Thomas Pinckney being sent as Minister to England and to Spain, where he negotiated the important Treaty of San Ildefonso, which secured to the United States the Florida boundary and the free navigation of the Mississippi.

Colonel C. C. Pinckney, was sent by Mr. Jefferson on the more difficult mission to the French Directory in 1797,—a mission which failed in its first effort (the securing of peace) because of the dishonora-

Have You Asthma or Hay-Fever?

Medical science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma and Hay Fever in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that it cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing, and that E. C. Hyde, of Amesbury, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay Fever season, being unable to lie down most of day. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To make the matter sure, these and hundreds of other cures are sworn to before a notary public. So great is their faith in its wonderful curative powers, the Kola Importing Co., of 164 Broadway, New York, to insure it known in sending out large cases of the Kola compound free to sufferers from Asthma and Hay Fever. All they ask in return is that when cured you will tell your neighbors about it. Send your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

ble terms proposed. It was in these that the indignant Carol declared that his country would give lions for defence, but not one cent more,"—an utterance which has not been forgotten.

Both brothers were candidates for the presidency, and both were unsuccessful. The account of party complication, spirit then ran high between the two brothers; but even Mr. R. A. biographer of Jefferson, the bitter antagonist of the Federalists, makes an exception of the "Rutledge-Pinckneys" in the accusations heaped upon most of their party the "friends of Washington" was the pride of the two brothers. The to him never failed, and he regarded with the utmost confidence.

The women of all the colonies committed to them a great though expected charge: to fit themselves sons to meet the coming change (government) in law and soberness, riot and anarchy, as did the unhappily of the French Revolution.

Those of the Southern States to do. They had to train and teach of savages,—a race which was known even the rudiments of civilization, or religion; a race whose labors of colonists and slaves, remains in Africa to-day as thousand years ago; but a race influenced by these lives, taught Southern people for six generations in the day of trial the most the most devoted of servants, and declared in 1863 by the Northern worthy to be its equal in civil and cal rights.

Requests for Prayer.

The Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission was offered on Aug. 9, in accordance with the requests of many persons among whom the following ask the aid of our readers:

Relatives and Friends. H. K., Thayer, Neb., asks prayer for a disobedient son who is causing much sorrow and anxiety, that God in his great mercy turn him from his wicked ways and give him a new heart; also that her husband, who was formerly a church-member, but has for the first time, may be restored to God's favor and serve him.—"Anxious Mother," Buffalo, Ill., that a dear son and his wife receive their hearts to God and become his faithful servants.—M. W., Calais, Vt., on behalf of her son and daughter and their families that they may all become followers of Christ.—K. W., Asbury Park, N. J., that her son-in-law might be saved from the bondage of intemperance and consecrate their life to the Lord's service.—"Anxious Mother," Nebraska, for the conversion of two daughters whose wicked tempers are making them miserable; also that her two sons receive their hearts to God.—"Friend," Pa., for the conversion of husband and child that the father may have grace to overcome his propensity for intoxicating drinks and be more reasonable with his son. There is urgent need of the Holy Spirit's grace to make their lives right.—"Anxious Mother," Buffalo, N. Y., that her husband and children may seek the Lord and become Christians.—A. J., West Point, Ark., for the conversion of a member of the household, his indifference to divine things can be overcome only by the Holy Spirit.—A. S., Me. Ill., that a young girl who is leading a life may be brought to see the evil of vice and turn to the Lord for pardon and power.—M. H. C., Philadelphia, Pa., on behalf of his wife, for whose conversion prayer has been offered for many years, led to Christ.—J. M. D., Somerdale, for the conversion of his children.—I. C., Wis., that a dear friend who is inclined to be skeptical may be brought to know the Lord and consecrate himself to him. He is a good man, anxious to do right, but without a real interest in Christ.—L. Cleburne, "Doubled One," Georgetown, Cal., that his son might be led to seek the Lord, become a child of God, and have wisdom given to him and do his duty.—"Believer," Harrison, Md., on behalf of a beloved sister who is in special danger through evil influence, that she may be converted and able to free herself from her infatuation, and give herself to Christ.—"Stranger in a Strange Land," that God would save her two sons and daughter, who are good, moral persons, but that hope in Christ.—"Mother," New York, that her children and grandchildren be made children of God.—"Anxious Mother," Brooklyn, N. Y., that his daughter, who has fallen under the influence of a godless man, might be drawn closer to Christ, and that a man who is leading her astray might be converted.—"Student," New Haven, Conn., that one whom he was instrumental in leading into evil before he was converted, become a Christian. The horror of blood-guiltiness is taking all the joy out of life, and he is very bitter. If God would save him he would be very thankful.

Restoration of Health. P. G. P., Isom, Ga., that God would mercifully restore the sense of hearing.—J. F. D., Etna, Me., that one who has been invalid for twenty years might be healed by the power of Lord.—F. H. D., Ohio, Wash., that his wife might recover her health.—Aged Reader, New Boston, Mass., that she may recover the use of a limb which has been helpless for two years, rendering her unable to support herself.—E. T. B., Lynn, Mass., for the recovery of her husband who is mentally and physically afflicted.—M. W., Caledonia, Ala., a poor sick man living alone on a deserted plantation suffering acutely, that God would have mercy on her in her loneliness and heal her of her ailment. She knows she has no help but Christ.—Believer, Windham, Me., that a sick brother who has been a patient sufferer for a long time may be restored to health.—Great Physician.—Constant Reader, Manchester, Iowa, who gratefully acknowledges the answer to prayers offered recently for the conversion of a friend, now asks prayer for another friend who is in feeble health and needs restoration.

Special Blessings. Widow in Oregon, that in declining years she may have rest and peace and that her enemies may forgive and forget the past.—"Believer," Worcester, Pa., who has made a profession of faith but is conscious that she is not fully converted, that God would enable her to come to him and give herself unreservedly to him; also that a boon earnestly sought might be granted.—Reader, Abilene, Tex., that the obstacle to the peace, spiritual development and prosperity of an unhappy family be removed.—One Ready to Perish, that in some way God would send financial help, that it may not be necessary to go out with aching nerves and debilitated body to do battle for bread; also that persecution may cease and that a faltering faith may be strengthened.—L. S., Jonesville, for more of the Holy Spirit and power to lead souls to Christ.—Friend, Irene, Ill., that two families who are related but are now at enmity might become friends and work together in the Lord's cause.—Anxious Mother, Buffalo, N. Y., that financial difficulties might be overcome.—Faith, Greensboro, N. C., that a husband and wife now separated might be reconciled and reunited.—Believer, Racine, Wis., that financial help may be granted to a family in imminent and urgent need.—A. H. D., Watrussville, Mich., that God would guide him to employment so that he may be enabled to support his young family honorably. The need is very urgent.—Reader, Tooele, Utah, that a husband and father may be enabled to speedily find employment and may obtain the help needed.—G. G. & F. R., Oregon, that the way may be opened for the removal of a burdensome debt and that two brothers may be enabled to complete their education.—Believer, Cleburne, Tex., that a widow in debt and difficulties may receive the help she needs to pay her way and support her children; also that two young men may succeed in finding employment.—J. M. D., Somerdale, O., that the works in that town may resume operation so that the people who are depending on them for occupation may have bread.—G. H., who in a business transaction has been wronged, and who has suffered in other ways, asks prayer that God would come to her help and enable her to obtain the means necessary to her maintenance and would take her life and make it what he would have it to be, and give her grace to acquiesce in his will.

Many other letters containing requests for prayer have been received which were without name, initials, place or any means of identification.

The Armenian Relief Work.

LETTERS have been received from American missionaries in Baiboot, Erzingan, Harpoot, Mardin, and several other places in Armenia and Mesopotamia, stating the present condition of affairs, and the progress of the relief work among the sufferers.

At Harpoot the situation is one of extreme destitution; no corn, no mattresses, and very little anything. The Kurds have pillaged towns and burned many of the dwellings. In some villages, the people are living on grass and have become pallid and sick in consequence. Moslems have seized the best farms and the cattle.

Baiboot needs more help, both for its own people and the inhabitants of the surrounding villages. Many of the Christians and Turks together are determined to rob them of their harvest and all their belongings, have taken what little bedding and food they can carry, and have gone to the mountains. From a few districts, favorable reports have been received, showing that the destitution is decreasing and peace and confidence returning; but these are exceptional. In almost every section of Armenia, the outlook for the next fall and winter is ominous.

During the week these additional contributions have been received to aid the destitute in Armenia:

African Modes of Speech.

Quaint Forms of Expression Used by the Gold Coast Natives.

MOST people are under the impression that after fairly mastering the vocabulary and the grammar of a language, they will be able to understand, speak and write that language. They are mistaken: the vocabulary and the grammar are simply the skeleton, the skin, and perhaps the muscles of organism called language. The blood in the veins, the magnetism in the nerves, the glow of the skin, the motion of the limbs—in one word, the life and the individuality of the organism, the language, are only to be found in its idiomatic expressions; in the way of looking at things, and expressing thoughts or feelings.

As in Hebrew and Biblical language, the arm is a metaphor for power, strength; and the bowels for compassion and affection; and as in modern English we are wont to say heart for sentiment, and brain for intellect, so the Gold Coast negroes speaking the Otshi language, make a figurative use of the body and its constituent parts.

In Otshi the body and the person itself are expressed by the word ho, which originally signifies locality on the surface, the outside of anything. Thus, the body is the outside of the person, and the latter is used to designate the ego, "self." "How do you do?" is rendered by "How does your self (or body, ho,) sit?"

"I am well," is "My self is good." "He is strong," is "His self is hard." "He is hard (hearted)," is, as in English, "He is hard." "He is vain," is "He exhibits his self." "He is impatient," is "His self torments, annoys him." "He is angry, exasperated," is "His self (body) cannot hold him," or "his skin is too tight for him." "He is well off, rich," is "He has acquired his self." "He has all he wants," becomes "His self has met his self."

The Head is used in the following figures: "His head is hard inside," for "He is perplexed." "He looks inside his head," for "He tries to remember." Considerable physiognomic discernment is shown in a number of graphic questions.

So with the Eyes: "His eye reddens," that is, "He covets." "His eye is fixed," meaning "He is homesick."

"His eye is fixed to the ground," for "He is humble." "His eye is hard," for "He is bold." "His eye is hot," for "He is indignant." "His eye is dying," for "He is ashamed." "His eye (or face) is weighty," for "He is thoughtful."

I imagine the man staring into the palm of his hand, and indicating its language as follows:

"His hand is not at rest; he keeps his hand in motion"—"He is active, diligent." "The palm of his hand is hard"—"He is not generous." "His hand slipped"—"He did wrong inadvertently."

The Ear appears in the following: "His ear is hard, stopped, or dead"—"He is disobedient." "He rouses, or hushes his ear"—"He hearkens." "He pulls my ear"—"He punishes me." "He withdraws his ear"—"He is indifferent; also confident (indifferent to risks)."

The Mouth, in these expressions: "His mouth is hard"—"He is too critical, or 'His mouth is heavy'—"He slanders." "He is reserved." "His mouth is sweet"—"He flatters," etc.

The Feet: "His foot is light"—"He is fleet-footed." "His foot is strong"—"He is a good walker, runner." "He pulls his (foot) soles"—"He takes big steps, strides." "He shows his (foot) soles"—"He runs away," etc.

A Book for the Millions!

It is a narrative of whatever is best and most inspiring in the annals of our country. The author has selected the most striking and important parts of the story, and has recited those parts with fervor and enthusiasm. All that is dull and commonplace in our past has been eliminated from the glowing narrative in the People's History. The vital essence is retained. The useless has given place to the useful, the dull to the romantic.

Among other important features this book contains portraits of prominent statesmen, including:

William McKinley, Whitebaw Reid, David B. Hill, A. P. Gorman, Rev. Chas. H. Parkhurst, President Cleveland, General John Bidwell, Gen'l James B. Weaver, Gen'l Nelson A. Miles, and Others.

Galilee's Ruined Cities.

Capernaum, the Centre of Christ's Ministry, and the Scene of Many of His Miracles—
The Sacred Associations of the Lake and its Borders.

IN the time of Christ, the Sea of Galilee was a centre of maritime life and activity. Fleets of ships and boats sailed over its blue waters, and its wharves were dotted with the huts of fishermen of the same social rank as those from whom Christ drew his disciples. In the cities on the shores there were mixed populations, and it was an important centre. For a number of years the Sanhedrim was at Tiberias, and there were thirteen synagogues and a school of languages there. Even yet, to be instructed by a rabbi of Tiberias is considered a great honor. From Tiberias one passes to El-Mejdel or Magdala, (the "Watch-tower,") a squalid little town, behind a low wall, and suffocatingly hot in summer. In its prime, Magdala must have been a place of importance and it is some writers have held to be the real site of Capernaum—is a pleasant walk, during which one sees the Horns of Hattin ("the Mount of Beatitudes"), the flower-studded Plain of Gennesaret and the blue sea itself, all combining to make a beautiful and invigorating picture. At the end of the Plain, a huge, black cliff is reached, at the foot of which is Ain-et-Tin, ("the Fountain of the Fig"), another claimant for identification as Capernaum. There are ruins here of great aqueducts, fine buildings, evidences of artistic taste and a high degree of civilization. About an hour's travel to the north is Tell Hum, which many modern scholars have deemed to be the true site of Capernaum. It is now lit-

Many assert that the ruins of the synagogue, still visible, are those of the one erected by the Roman Centurion mentioned in Luke 7: 5, and in which Christ's discourse on the "Bread of Life" was delivered and the demoniac was healed. The synagogue is estimated to have been seventy-four feet in length, fifty-six in width, and with walls ten feet in thickness. It was richly decorated and was unquestionably the finest edifice in Upper Galilee.

It will be remembered that, after the expulsion of Jesus from Nazareth, where he was trained and received at least part of his education, Capernaum became his home. It was here that, seated in a boat, he began teaching; here he chose Matthew as his follower, and here also the brothers, Simon-Peter and Andrew, left their belongings to become A Soft Tongue.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Proverbs 25: 15, "A soft tongue breaketh the bone."

WHEN Solomon said this he drove a whole volume into one phrase. You, of course, will not be so silly as to take the words of the text in a literal sense. They simply mean to set forth the fact that there is a tremendous power in a kind word. Although it may seem to be very insignificant, its force is indescribable and illimitable. Pungent and all-conquering utterance: "A soft tongue breaketh the bone."

If I had time, I would show you kindness as a means of defence, as a means of usefulness, kindness as a means of domestic harmony, kindness as best employed by governments for the taming and curing of criminals, and kindness as best adapted for the settling and adjusting of international quarrel; but I shall call your attention only to two of these thoughts.

And first, I speak to you of kindness as a means of defence. Almost every man, in the course of his life, is set upon and assaulted. Your motives are misinterpreted or your religious or political principles are bombarded. What to do under such circumstances is the question. The first impulse of the natural heart says: "Strike back. Give as much as he sent. Trip him into the ditch which he dug for your feet. Gash him with as severe a wound as that which he inflicted on your soul. Shot for shot. Sarcasm for sarcasm. An eye for an eye. A tooth for a tooth." But the better spirit in the man's soul rises up and says: "You ought to consider that matter." You look up into the face of Christ and say: "My Master, how ought I to act under these difficult circumstances?" And Christ instantly answers: "Bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you." Then the old nature rises up again and says: "You had better not forgive him until first you have chastised him. You will never get him in so tight a corner again. You will never have such an opportunity of inflicting the right kind of punishment upon him again. First chastise him, and then let him go." "No," says the better nature, "hush, thou art breaking the bone." Have you ever in all your life known acerbity and acrimonious dispute to settle a quarrel? Did they not always make matters worse and worse and worse? About fifty-five years ago there was a great quarrel in the Presbyterian family. Ministers of Christ were thought orthodox in proportion as they had measured lances with other clergymen of the same denomination. The most outrageous personalities were abroad. As, in the autumn, a hunter comes home with a string of game, partridges and wild ducks, slung over his shoulder, so there were many ministers who came back from the ecclesiastical courts with long strings of doctors of divinity whom they had shot with their own rifle. The division became wider, the animosity greater, until after awhile some good men resolved upon another tack. They began to explain away the difficulties; they began to forgive each other's faults; and lo! the great Church quarrel was settled; and the new school Presbyterian Church and the old school Presbyterian Church became one. The different parts of the Presbyterian family, which were once separated, were now united. — Illustration of the Christian's duty to his neighbor. —

You say to him, "I despise you." He replies, "I can't bear the sight of you." You say to him, "Never enter my house again." He says, "If you come on my door sill, I'll kick you off." You say to him, "I'll put you down." He says to you, "You are mistaken; I'll put you down." And so the contest rages; and year after year you act the unchristian part, and he acts the unchristian part. After awhile the better spirit seizes you, and one day you go over to the neighbor, and say, "Give me your hand. We have fought long enough. Time is so short, and eternity is so near, that we cannot afford any longer to quarrel. I feel you have wronged me very much; but let us settle all now in one great hand-shaking, and be good friends for all the rest of our lives." You have risen to a higher platform than that on which before you stood. You win his admiration, and you get his apology. But if you have not conquered him in that way, at any rate you have won the applause of your own conscience, the high estimation of good men, and the honor of your Lord who died for his armed enemies.

"But," you say, "what are we to do when slanders assault us, and there come acrimonious sayings all around about us, and we are abused and spit upon?" My reply is: Do not go and attempt to chase down the slanders. Lies are prolific, and while you are killing one, fifty are born. All your demonstrations of indignation only exhaust yourself. You might as well on some summer night when the swarm of insects are coming up from the meadow and disturbing you and disturbing your family, bring up some great "swamp angel," like that which thundered over Charleston, and try to shoot them down. The game is too small for the gun. But what, then, are you to do with the abuses that come upon you in life? You are to live them down! I saw a farmer go out to get back a swarm of bees that had wandered off from the hive. As he moved amid them they buzzed around his head, and buzzed around his hands, and buzzed around his feet. If he had killed one of them they would have stung him to death. But he moved in their midst in perfect placidity until he had captured the swarm of wandering bees. And so I have seen men moving amid the annoyances, and the vexations, and the assaults of life in such calm, Christian deliberation, that all the buzzing around about their soul amounted to nothing. They conquered them, and, above all, they conquered themselves. "O," you say, "that's a very good theory to preach on a hot day, but it won't work." It will work. It has worked. I believe it is the last Christian grace we win. You know there are fruits which we gather in June, and others in July, and others in August, and others in September, and still others in October; and I have to admit that this grace of Christian forgiveness is about the last fruit of the Christian soul. We hear a great deal about the bitter tongue, and the sarcastic tongue, and the quick tongue, and the stinging tongue; but we know very little about "the soft tongue that breaketh the bone." We read Hudibras, and Sterne, and Dean Swift, and the other apostles of acrimony, but give little time to studying the example of him who was reviled, and yet reviled not again. O that the Lord, by his Spirit, would endow us all with "the soft tongue that breaketh the bone."

I pass now to the other thought that I desire to present, and that is, kindness as a means of usefulness. In all communities you find sceptical men. Through early education, or through the maltreatment of professed Christian people, or through prying curiosity about the future world, there are a great many people who become sceptical in religious things. How shall you capture them for God? Sharp argument and sarcastic retort never won a single soul from scepticism to the Christian religion. While powerful books on "The Evidences of Christianity" have their mission in confirming Christian people in the faith they have already adopted, I have noticed that when sceptical people are brought into the kingdom of Christ, it is through the charm of some genial soul, and not by argument at all. Men are not saved through the head; they are saved through the heart. A storm comes out of its hiding-place. It says: "Now we'll just rouse up all this sea;" and it makes a great bluster, but it does not succeed. Part of the sea is roused up—perhaps one-half of it or one-fourth of it. After awhile the calm moon, placid and beautiful, looks down, and the ocean begins to rise. It comes up to high-water-mark. It embraces the great headlands. It submerges the beach of all the continents. It is the heart-throb of one world against the heart-throb of another world. And I have to tell you that while all your storms of ridicule and storms of sarcasm may rouse up the passion of an immortal nature, nothing less than the attractive power of Christian kindness can ever raise the deathless spirit to happiness and to God. I have more faith in the prayer of a child five years old, in the way of bringing an infidel back to Christ and to heaven, than I have in all the hissing thunderbolts of ecclesiastical controversy. You cannot overcome men with religious argumentation. If you come at a sceptical man with an argument on behalf of the Christian religion, you put the man on his mettle. He says: "I see that man has a carbine. I'll use my carbine. I'll answer his argument with my argument." But if you come to that man, persuading him that you desire his happiness on earth and his eternal welfare in the world to come, he cannot answer it.

What I have said is just as true in the reclamation of the openly vicious. Did you ever know a drunkard to be saved through the caricature of a drunkard? Your mimicry of the staggering step, and the thick tongue, and the disgusting hic-cough, only worse maddens his brain. But if you come to him in kindness and sympathy; if you show him that you appreciate the awful grip of a depraved appetite; if you persuade him of the fact that thousands who had the grappling-hooks of evil inclination clutched in their soul as firmly as they now are in his, have been rescued, then a ray of light will flash across his vision, and it will seem as if a supernatural hand were steadying his staggering gait. A good many years ago there lay in the streets of Richmond, Va., a man dead drunk, his face exposed to the blistering noonday sun. A Christian woman passed along, looked at him, and said, "Poor fellow." She took her handkerchief and spread it over his face, and passed on. The man roused himself up from his debauch and began to look at the handkerchief, and, lo! on it was the name of a highly respectable Christian woman of the city of Richmond. He went to her, he thanked her for her kindness; and that one little deed saved him for this life, and saved him for the life that is to come. He was afterward Attorney-General of the United States; but, higher than all, he became the consecrated disciple of Jesus Christ. Kind words are so cheap, it is a wonder we do not use them oftener. There are tens of thousands of people in these cities who are dying for the lack of one kind word. There is a business man who has fought against trouble until he is perfectly exhausted. He has been thinking about forgery, about robbery, about suicide. Go to that business man him that better times are coming, him that you yourself were in a tightness pass, and the Lord deliver. Tell him to put his trust in God. That Jesus Christ stands beside business man in his perplexities him of the sweet promises of God fortifying grace. That man is dying lack of just one kind word. Go to and utter that one saving, omniscient kind word. Here is a soul that has been swamped in sin. He wants to see the light of the Gospel. He feels like a wrecked mariner looking out on a beach, watching for a sail against the sky, or bear down on him. Tell him that the Lord waits to be gracious to him though he has been a great sinner. Tell him that the Lord's love is a great Saviour provided. Tell him that though his sins are as scarlet, they shall be as snow; though they are red like crimson, they shall be as wool. That man is dying forever for the lack of one word. There used to be sung at many of the pianos all through the city a song that has almost died. I wish somebody would start it again in our social circles. There may not have been a very exquisite art in the music, but it was a grand and glorious sentiment.

Kind words never die, never die:
Cherished and blessed.

O, that we might in our families our Churches try the force of kj You can never drive men, women, dren into the kingdom of God. A northeaster will bring out more suckles than fretfulness and scold ever bring out Christian grace. I w in all our religious work we m saturated with the spirit of kj Missing that, we miss a great deal fullness. There is no need of com before men and thundering to th law unless at the same time you p them the Gospel. The world is d lack of kindness.

These young people want it much as the old. The old people times seem to think they have a more of the rheumatisms, and the neuralgias, and the headaches, and the physicians of the world; but I tell you there is no worse heartaches than are felt by these young people. Do you think that much of the work is done by young? Raphael died at thirty; Richelieu at thirty-one; Gustavus Adolphus died at thirty-eight; Innocent came to his mightiest influence at seven; Cortez conquered Mexico at twenty; Don John won Lepanto at twenty-four; Grotius was attorney-general at thirty-four; and I have noticed amid all the men that some of the severest battles and the toughest work come before the young. Therefore we must have our sermons and our exhortations in prayer meetings sympathetic with the young. We must lead these people further on in life. Do these doctors and lawyers and preachers and clergymen and mechanics care about the distractions of religion? What they care is to bear the whimsicalities of the patients, the browbeating of legal opponents, the unfairness of customers, who find plenty of fault-finding for every thing that is excellence. What does that brain-blistered man care for? What does that hand-blistered man care for? What does that man care for? "Doctrine of Original Sin," or "Doctrine of Anthropology?" You must get well on to a man who has the pleurisy put on his side a plaster made out of Parr's "Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence."

In all our sermons there must be for every one somewhere. You go to an apothecary store. We see other people waiting on; we do not complain because we do not immediately get the medicine we want. We know our turn will come after a while. And so while all parts of a sermon are not appropriate to our case, if we wait prayerfully, before the sermon is finished, we shall have the divine prescription for us. We say to these young men who are going to the college, "Wait."

With the Gospel, these theological students—I say to them, We want in our sermons not more metaphysics, nor more imagination, nor more logic, nor more propriety. What we want in our sermons of Christian exhortations is more sympathy. When Father Taylor preached in the sailors' Bethel at Boston, the jack tars they had help for their duties among the ratlines and the forecastles. When Ward Weaver preached to the opera-house in Oldham, England, all the workmen felt they had more grace for the species.

Do you not know that this simple story of Saviour's kindness is to redeem all nations? The hard heart of this world's slavery is to be broken before that story. There is in Antwerp, Belgium, one of the most remarkable pictures I ever saw. It is "Descent of Christ from the Cross." It is one of Ruben's pictures. No man can stand and look at that "Descent from the Cross," as Rubens pictured it, without having his eyes flooded with tears, if he have sensibility at all. It is an overmastering picture—one that stuns you and staggers you and haunts your dreams. One afternoon a man stood in that cathedral looking at Ruben's "Descent from the Cross." He was all absorbed in that scene of a Saviour's sufferings when the janitor came and said: "It is time to close up the cathedral for the night. I wish you would depart." The pilgrim looking at that "Descent from the Cross," turned around to the janitor and said: "No, no; not yet. Wait until they get him down." O, it is the story of a Saviour's suffering kindness that is to capture the world. When the hosts of that great behemoth of iniquity which has trampled all nations shall be broken and shattered, it will be found out that the work was not done by the hammer of the iconoclast, or by the sword of the conqueror, or by the torch of persecution, but by the plain, simple, overwhelming force of "the soft tongue that breaketh bone."

Kindness! We all need more of it in our hearts, our words and our behavior. The chief characteristic of our Lord was kindness. A gentleman in England, leaving his fortune by will to two sons. The son that stayed at home deceived the father's will and pretended to be the brother who was absent was dead and buried. The absent brother, after awhile, returned and claimed his share of the property. Judges and jurors were to be bribed to say that the returned brother and son was no son at all, but an impostor. The trial came on. Sir Matthew Hale, the pride of the English court-room and for twenty years the pride of jurisprudence, heard that that injustice should be practised. He put off his judicial robe. He put on the garb of a pleader. He went to the village where that brother was to take place. He entered the court-room. He somehow got empanelled one of the jurors. A verdict was bought in rejecting the right of this returned brother. He was to have no share in the inheritance. "Hold! my lord," said the miller. "Hold! my lord, we are not all agreed on this verdict. These other men have received ten pieces of gold in bribery and I have received only five." "Who are you? Where do you come from?" said the judge on the bench. The response was: "I am from Westminster Hall; my name is Matthew Hale, Lord Chief Justice of the king's bench. Off of that place, thou villain!" And so the injustice was ended, and so the young man got his inheritance.

It was all for another that Sir Matthew Hale took off his robe and put on the garb of a miller. And so Christ took off his robe of royalty and put on the attire of humanity, and in that disguise he won his eternal portion. Now are we the sons of God. Joint heirs! We went off from the sure enough, but we got back in order to receive our eternal inheritance. And Christ was so kind to us, surely we can afford to be kind to each other.

Galilee's Ruined Cities.

dering multitudes unto himself. Here was sounded the first missionary call the world had ever heard, when the Son of Man demanded that his followers forsake all and follow him, to do his work among the children of men. Capernaum as a centre and the seat of a synagogue was especially suited to the purposes of his ministry. Peter had a house there, and Jesus was always sure of a hospitable welcome. It was on the highway of a great caravan route, and besides gave ready access by sea to the cities of the Lake. He therefore made it the central point of his ministry for a year, preached and healed there, and made excursions to the surrounding towns, always returning to Capernaum to rest and pass the Sabbath. Here were wrought the miracles of the Centurion's servant, on Simon's wife's mother, on the paralytic man and the man afflicted with an unclean spirit. Here also dwelt the nobleman's son, whose cure was effected by words which Christ spoke while in Cana of Galilee. It was in Capernaum, too, that the remarkable discourse recorded in John 6 was spoken in the Synagogue. Much of the early labors of the Master were done in that town of Galilee, which, later, proved so unresponsive and unfaithful that it evoked his severest denunciation: "and thou Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell; for if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained unto this day." (Matt. 11: 23).

It was because this province was more honored with the presence and ministry of Jesus than any other that he was called a Galileean. Moreover, it was to Galilee that he commanded his disciples to repair and meet with him after his resurrection. (Matt. 28: 7-10). Of this favored country, almost all if not the whole of the apostles were natives, for which reason they were called "men of Galilee." (Acts 1:11). Nathaniel was a native of Cana, (John 21: 2). Bethsaida was the birthplace of Andrew, Peter and Philip.

Since the time of Christ the whole geography of the Lake and its surroundings has undergone a considerable change. The ruin that involved not only Capernaum but other cities of the Lake has given rise to differences of opinion as to identification. Concerning Capernaum it is held by some that the town was situated on the Plain of Gennesaret where, according to Josephus, the Jewish historian, there was a fountain called Capharnaum. Dr. Pococke and other eminent scholars stones, and the walls of several large buildings standing solitarily by, as though to emphasize the general destruction.

Led by a Little Child.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond relates the following touching incident of a child's conversion and how it was made the means of bringing a mother also to Christ:

"At a recent children's meeting in Washington a young mother was present with her little boy. Dr. Rankin, the minister of the church, approached the two, and addressed himself first to the mother. He then turned to the little lad, and soon found that his heart had been touched with a view of Jesus on the cross 'lifted up for him,' and very soon the little fellow was weeping for his sins. He prayed with him; the boy, too, prayed for himself, and finally looked to Jesus, and believed on him as the Saviour of little children. It has since been evident that he was truly converted by the spirit of God. The unconverted mother sat looking upon this with much displeasure. Finally she expressed her belief that the boy was too young to understand such a difficult problem. But said Dr. Rankin to her, 'You need not shake your head; this boy knows more than you do on this subject.'

"On the way home the boy seemed very much interested in his mother's salvation, and said, 'Mamma, what did Dr. Rankin say to you?' She avoided giving him an answer; and he added: 'Didn't you give yourself up to Jesus who died for us? I did; and oh, it's so easy, mamma! Won't you come to him too? I know he'll receive you, and we shall all be so happy!' The mother's heart was deeply moved. That night, after he had retired, he called his mother to his bedside. He arose, knelt down, and prayed to God to forgive him and her. The boy would not rest until his mother promised to go back to the meeting with him the next evening. She went and was glad to have Dr. Rankin talk with her; and now she and another of her children are rejoicing in Jesus."

Civilizing the Apaches.

It has been frequently contended that certain tribes of Indians cannot be civilized, but Carlisle Indian School stands for the civilizing and educating of the Red man. Not one in twenty of the well-trained graduates fails to make his or her way on equal terms among the whites. They are trained to use a savings bank, keep their own books and buy their own clothing with more or less supervision. A Congressman once said, "There is as much hope of educating an Apache as there is of educating the rattlesnake on which he feeds." But that view is exploded long ago. Dr. Carlos Montezuma is a full-blooded Apache, who was enslaved as a child, redeemed for $30 and who had part of a white man's chance. He has been the resident physician, and is now doing well in Chicago. Another graduate is a writer on a daily newspaper, Levi Levering, an Omaha Indian who has written often for the press, propose, an alumni reunion at St. Paul Institute July 20 to 25. They are learning self-respect and righteousness. Said one of the recent graduates: "I am proud of my sheepskin and of my red skin, too."

A MODERN FISHING-BOAT ON LAKE GENNESARET.

Christ variously called by the people of Palestine, the Sea of Galilee, Lake Tiberias, and the Lake of Gennesaret, the natives now know the sheet of placid blue water as Bahr Tubariyeh. It is oval in shape and only about thirteen miles long and six miles in breadth; yet a greater number of the striking events associated with sacred history have occurred along its shores and upon its waters than in any other locality in Palestine, outside of Jerusalem itself. On the eastern side are mountains nearly 2000 feet high, bleak and destitute of foliage and deeply furrowed by ravines, while on the west are beautiful valleys and charming defiles, watered by clear, purling streams. There is still an abundance of fish in the Lake, although its fisheries no longer furnish the principle occupation of its people as of old. It is subject to sudden and violent storms that sweep down the mountain sides, especially during the summer season. This fact recalls the famous miracle of the stilling of the tempest when Christ calmed the angry waters of Galilee and allayed the fears of his disciples as related in Matt. 8: 18-27. Indeed, the whole region round about may be accurately described as a land of miracles and divine teaching for on searching the Gospels we find that the following events took place in Galilee:

Nazareth.—At the house of the Mary..... Luke 1:26

believed that an old spring, still further south and known among the natives today as Ain-Tel-Mudahe-warrah (the "Round Fountain") was the true site, while Dr. Robinson disagrees with all other investigators, and holds that a mound of ruins known by the Arabs as Khan Minyeh covers the real location. As already indicated, however, the strongest claimant, and one which contains the greatest elements of probability, is Tell-Hum. There the shapeless remains are piled up in confusion all along the beach, including temple stones and ruins of synagogues and churches, of beautiful marble, evidently cut from the mountains to the northwest. Our photograph, taken on the scene of this heaped-up ruin, shows how terribly and literally the judgment of Christ against that city was fulfilled. Its picturesque remains are so broken and levelled as to be almost invisible from the sea, and the simple fisherfolk of to-day, who sail past the place in their ancient-looking boats, seem little to appreciate the fact that the great Nazarene spent there a portion of his life, from youth to young manhood, and performed many of his marvelous miracles.

Two hour's travel brings into sight Bethsaida. It is merely a squalid group of mud huts occupied by the poorest class of fishermen, but with most picturesque surroundings of mountain and lake. Kerazeh, believed to be the ancient Chorazin.

An Opportunity for Everybody to Befriend the Poor Tenement Children—Our Mont-Lawn Home's Busiest Season Among the Little Sufferers.

SUMMER, which brings peculiar pleasures to many who dwell in city and country, has this year held new terrors for the poor. In every large city, and especially in New York, there are multitudes who regard the fierce July and August heats with greater dread than the winter cold. The phenomenal and continued heat this summer has more than doubled the usual high mortality of the tenements, and has brought breakable sorrow into many a home of poverty. During these blazing days and long nights, when the tenement population is fighting the heat as best it can, all the well-to-do who are able to leave the city do so. There is not always a thought for the wretched family in the back of the slum, who probably never knew what a holiday meant and whose little, footed children, with white and pinched faces, make a sad contrast with the rich, well-fed, well-clad children of comfortable homes. It is not an infrequent sight, these hot, sickly summer nights, to find hundreds of poor tenement dwellers sleeping in the public parks the sleep they cannot find indoors. In view of the great heat, the authorities decided to permit sleeping in some of the parks, and this has been a great boon to thousands of the poor. Our artist has shown a nook of one of the public parks with its occupants—the fathers and wearied mothers with children more dead than alive. This privilege has been a blessing, since it has brought a few hours' respite from suffering. Our missionaries have been unusually active during the hot spell, searching out the worst cases of children, and taking them to our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn for recuperation. Among the children who were to be taken, this morning, were three whom the missionary explained she was particularly anxious to send, as they were all in great need of such a change, and their mother was very sick and consumption. The doctor "passed" them, prescribing for one who needed special medical attention, and they went fully home to pack their little bundles. Not returning at the time appointed to start for the boat, a couple of boys were finally sent to their home to learn the reason. They soon returned, all out of breath, and the sad intelligence that their poor mother had just died. The motherless children were left in that poverty-stricken hovel! These children will probably all go to Mont-Lawn in a few days. As our physician resides at the Children's Home this year, we are able to give the children better medical attention than it was ever possible to give before, and many a little sufferer is made joyful, and an anxious mother's heart relieved, to learn that the doctor is only going to "pass" the little one, and will give the necessary treatment while in the Home, which together with the fresh country air and the nutritious food, will insure the little patient's complete restoration to health. One wee fellow, so badly deformed that he could hardly walk, was treated so successfully that he is greatly improved. When the doctor comes home at night there is generally a patient or two—a girl with an abscess ready to be lanced, or a boy who wants a missing tooth extracted, and before she can even eat her supper, the doctor will have attended to a number of little patients. Up to the present time over two hundred and fifty have received the personal attention of the doctor.

As the work of our Children's Home has been unusually heavy this summer, owing to the very widespread suffering, the expenses of conducting it have been greatly increased. This has been unavoidable, for it was impossible to refuse help when so many little ones were perishing.

Their hollow and haggard faces
Languid, listless, and weary bodies,
And wasted hands were extended
To catch the crumbs that fall.
For within there were light and plenty,
And odors filled the air;
But without there were death and darkness,
And a great and terrible fear.

Mont-Lawn this year has saved more little lives than in the two preceding seasons and it has yet a great work to do before the season is ended. We invite all our friends to help us by contributing, liberally and lovingly, to this work, which their generosity has thus far carried forward so successfully. Let every reader of this journal, who has the welfare of the poor little waifs of the tenements at heart, respond to the appeal for the little sufferers, and thus enable the Home to continue at its full capacity during the remaining weeks of the summer. No gift however small will be unwelcome, and all will be acknowledged in these columns.

It is a pleasure to read some of the kind letters that are received from patrons of the Home. We give below extracts from a few recently received:

Mrs. G. J. F., Henderson, N. Y., sends this kind note with a gift of $2.00 for the Home:

My heart has ached for the little ones ever since I read of the first arrival at Mont-Lawn. I have wished so many times I had lots of money to send to them. Last Saturday the thought came to me that I could start a fund for the little ones, and I have give this to some child who is very anxious to go. May God bless you to your good work.

"Three dollars to send one little one to Mont-Lawn. For Jesus' sake," writes L. M., Randolph, Md.

Bertha Schmutz, Paterson, N. J., writes: "Oh, how the little ones are to be blessed! when I read of the suffering and sad condition is done under your auspices, I wish I could send you my contribution a hundred times larger. Nevertheless, I have sent a little, and I trust that the Lord has made for all."

In the same cordial strain writes C. E. W., of Pasadena, Cal., ($2.):

I wish it was the case that I could send you as much as there are little ones to be helped, and think of the pitiful faces I once saw on children in the slums of Boston, old in sin and suffering, while mere babes in years and size.

"I would gladly multiply it ($3) a hundred-fold if it were possible! Blessed work and blessed workers!" is the letter of B. C. F., Ann Arbor, Mich.

"The blessing of him who loves the children be with the workers, and with all who are seeking the good of the 'little ones,'" is the prayer that comes with the gift of Mr. C. R., of Marion, N. Y.

The King's Daughters of Twenty-fourth Street M. E. Sunday School, New York, have provided for five children, and in forwarding their gift ($15), write: "With prayers for the prosperity of this most worthy benevolence and assured of the very great good it is doing."

Mrs. J. S., Price Post-office, Mo., writes:

My husband is only a poor farmer, and we have suffered loss in nearly everything we had to sell, but our Bible says: "For if thou shalt give to the poor, blessing shall follow thee, and may it be the means of doing some good in his cause."

A blessing must surely follow such a gift!

How thoughtful is this note from Mrs. J. R. T., of Mineral Point, Wis.:

These three dollars are to send one little one to Mont-Lawn. Please send that one.

During the week, a very pretty and touching gift to the Children's Home came from Jerusalem. Mr. Thomas J. Alley wrote to Miss Delaney, of the Catharine Street Mission, enclosing a number of cards of beautifully pressed flowers from the Holy Land, to be sold and the proceeds devoted to the Home. This gift was prompted by an article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which described the meeting of a group of girls who were eager to help the Mont-Lawn Home.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

OUR daily mail is still burdened with letters of inquiry and of praise concerning our wonderful Encyclopedia offer. It has awakened young men and women all over the Union to a sense of the splendid opportunity afforded of securing a most valuable practical aid to education. We can find space for only a few of these letters:

W. J. Paterson, N. J. I would like to have one of the Encyclopedias, but can only do so if you accept my offer. I am willing to become a subscriber at the same time, and also allow an extension of time, say four months. Being a working-man, I am unable to do otherwise.

We will do as you ask, having made a similar extension of time in other cases.

Charles Herschling, 154 Academy street, Long Island City, N. Y., writes:

The World-Wide Encyclopedia arrived safely. I am greatly pleased with them. They far exceed my expectations. I shall send the list of new subscribers and balance due within a month.

This young lady writes appreciatively of her prize:

F. S. S. M. L., Aug. 18, 1904. I just received my box of books, and am more than pleased with them. I sent in five subscribers yesterday and will send the other five by Sept. 1.

And so also do a host of others, including Mr. H. H. Jones, of Boydton, Va., who says: I am very much pleased. I shall do all I can to get the subscribers as soon as possible.

Thos. T. Porter, Reading, Pa. I am glad I availed myself of your generous offer. When I first undertook to do it some of my friends tried to dissuade me, because, they said, "times were too hard." But when I started in to work I found it quite easy to get subscribers for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and no evidence of hard times anywhere.

Your experience is like that of many others. Begun in good earnest, it is easy enough to get subscribers, and with such a golden prize as the World-Wide Encyclopedia in view, the task should be a pleasant one from start to finish.

Here is a bright and cheery letter—such a one as we like to receive in our mail:

Des Moines, Ia., Aug. 18. Enclosed I send you $15 in gold to pay for ten subscribers. Silver or no silver, I shall always continue to subscribe for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is the best paper we ever took in our household. My two children solicited these subscribers among their Sunday School teachers, and they have now earned for themselves a set of your splendid World-Wide Encyclopedia. C. HARDING.

But we might fill many columns with these voluntary testimonials showing the high appreciation of the Encyclopedia by our readers who have thus far received sets. "I cannot thank you enough for otherwise I could not have gotten so many splendid books which I really need," writes Miss Annie Abbott, of W. Newton, Pa. M. F. C. Trimble, 113 Suydam St., Brooklyn, writes: "I congratulate myself on getting such a valuable work so easily. They are just what I have been looking for." "The books, I must say, are beautiful," writes Geo. E. Redemeyer, Camden, N. J. Bessie and Worrall Hodson, of Roxborough, Pa., write: "We worked hard for the Encyclopedia, but we feel rewarded, as the books will help us a great deal." "We are now 'in touch' with the whole world," writes Mrs. C. W. Babcock, 151 Athens St., Buffalo, N. Y. "You are conferring a life-long benefit, in this valuable present; and how you can afford to do it, is a mystery to us." T. W. Carhart, Hazlet, N. J., has this enthusiastic line in his letter: "People to whom I have shown them say it is the only valuable premium they have ever seen. To obtain only ten subscribers seems too few to secure such a present."

It is not surprising, therefore, that the height of the tower of Babel and is still standing. 1. Because they were the descendants of Judah, one of the patriarchs, who gave his name to the tribe of Judah and the kingdom of that name. 2. He was the King of Salem who went forth to meet Abraham on his return from the pursuit of Chedorlaomer and his allies. He combined the office of priest and king, as was not unusual in patriarchal times. 3. The ruins of the tower or temple of Birs Nimroud, which many hold to be identical with the tower of Babel, show that it was pyramidal in character, the first or basement stage an exact square 272 feet each way and 26 feet in height. There were seven stages or stories each of decreasing square and height, and on the seventh was placed (or to be placed) an ark or tabernacle. The entire height of Birs Nimroud would have been 156 feet. It is proper to add that there are rivals to the claims of Birs Nimroud for identification as the Tower of Babel and that the great pyramidal temples at Warka and Mugheir (which belong to an age about B.C. 2230 to 2300—little later than Babel), are probably equally fair types of the great tower mentioned in Genesis. 4. Dr. W. McDermott, Chaplain of the County Prison, Norristown, Pa., writes:

As Chaplain for about ten years past, and interested in work for the inmates of the county prison since 1859, I have been the recipient of papers, tracts, and other matter of that nature for the use of the inmates, sent by kind and every thoughtful Christian people. And it persons would only think of the good they might do in this line by a very little thought, many a mind of those who have been sinners, not above all others, however, would be turned into a better way of living, and no more a menace to the community. But the papers or tracts should be clean and attractive. If of that character, then the tendency will be elevating. Clean tracts can always be profitably employed.

J. Landers, Reading, Pa. In a recent conversation, an acquaintance contended that Queen Victoria, not the Sultan, was the richest monarch in Europe, if not in the world. Are there any persons capable of estimating her wealth?

She is doubtless very rich, but it is the merest guesswork for any one uninformed on the subject to put it in figures. Much of her wealth is said to be invested in securities. Her real estate consists of Osborne House, Aberfeldie House, Balmoral Castle, some six hundred rent-yielding houses in various parts of England and the leaseholds of several thousand others. She has also large estates in Yorkshire, Oxfordshire, and Berks, others in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, the Isle of Man, and Alderney. These are all her private property. She has also four sea-going yachts.

"More than pleased," is what J. E. Rupp, Harrisburg, Pa., writes of the Encyclopedia. He says:

I am a subscriber to the Encyclopedia sent by you, and desire to say I am more than pleased with it. I have not time to write you a long letter, but I expect to have time to do so in the future.

Student, New Haven, Conn. I am pursued with the question of the origin of the human race. There is no evidence from the writings of secular historians that man ever existed before the time of the flood. The only evidence that man existed before the flood is the Bible. The Bible is the only authority that we have for the origin of the human race. The Bible is the only authority that we have for the origin of the human race.

Are you not expecting too much in requiring evidence from secular historians? Do you think that if a carpenter in some obscure corner of the world in our day were to go around teaching and preaching that our literary men would take notice of him, even now when they are so much interested in the most modern and unequalled facilities? He might be incidentally mentioned as a crank with a new form of heresy, but that would be all. The three years of his teaching would be speedily forgotten, and if he made no attempt to immortalize himself by writing a book, the world would hurry on and take no notice of him. There is no logical ground for doubting that Jesus lived. Indeed, you cannot account for Christianity without believing that he lived.

F. W. C., Florence, Minn., writes, to ask if The World-Wide Encyclopedia is "up-to-date and first-class for a young man." It is the most recent publication of its kind, and later than any of the other encyclopedias. No young man or woman could desire a finer or more comprehensive intellectual equipment than it furnishes.

H. S. P., Savannah, Ga. Are the words, "The mills of God grind slowly," original with Longfellow? Were they previously written, "The mills of the gods grind slowly?"

It is not improbable that the idea may have been used by some earlier writer, but the first use of it, in the poetic form which we now know, was in Longfellow's poem, entitled: "Retribution."

Jessie L., Danbury, Conn. What is the proper meaning of consecration—a word I frequently hear applied to persons who are endeavoring to lead godly lives?

In his little handbook, Rev. M. R. Drury has furnished a compact explanation of what consecration really is. It is to be set apart in a peculiar sense to the Lord's service, and it therefore implies that we must be willing to be, to do, and to suffer all that he requires of us—without reserve. This embraces reputation, friends, property, time, everything; all the powers of body, mind and heart, to be used where, when and how he directs. Such a consecration is for life. The consecrated one cuts loose from the world and from self and renounces all ownership of himself or his Subscriber, Kansas City, Mo. Can you tell me to overcome a besetting sin?

If you are sincere in wishing to overcome there is no doubt of your being successful. Your explanatory letter implies that you are, but there is no basis for it. The trouble that in nearly all such cases as yours is self-deception. The victim is a willing tim. Assuming, however, that you are honest and do not wish to lose your soul, a surely will, if you do not quit your sin, give you advice. First of all, your hope in Christ. He is ready and willing to do you if you wish it, but he will not save in spite of yourself. If you, in your heart, are determined to continue in sin, you will get no help from him. You must prove your wish delivered by yourself working to that end. You can do so by avoiding, as far as possible, the occasions and opportunities for commission. Regulate your diet so as to avoid the grosser condition of the flesh. Use up some study, or some course of reading, exercise, to which you are inclined. Do something that will fully occupy your mind, so that you have no leisure for reverie or inclination to indulge in sinful thoughts. Put your study or amusement vigorously, resolve to become a master in it. Avoid such reading or such pictures, as suggest temptation, make it clear to all about you that you are determined to lead a new life. This is your business. If you perform it honestly and faithfully Christ will give you the strength you need. Pray to him constantly and you will be delivered.

H. C. R., Hammon, N. J. 1. Am I right in thinking that there are two alternatives for every man? To do what he believes to be right, and be saved, or do what he believes to be wrong and be lost? 2. Why does the Bible mention the execution of witches when there are no such creatures?

1. A man who does what he believes to be wrong is certainly in danger of being lost. We should not be safe in saying that a man who does what he believes to be right will be saved. He may be misinformed, or he may be prejudiced, and may do wrong believing to be right. Paul's is a case in point. He declared that when he persecuted the Christians he thought he was doing God a service. 2. The Jews were persons pretending to the power of witchcraft and they did mischief in proportion to the degree of credulity in others. The legislation prescribed in the Bible was progressive, dealing with the needs of the time.

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Rainy Night.

IT rained in torrents. The train from Jericho was late, but it pulled into the station at last, and the few passengers who had been waiting, stepped on board, found seats, and were presently whirled away into the darkness. The engine roared, the deluge poured down, the engine forged ahead.

The conductor had to speak twice before he gained the attention of the man in the rear car, on the last seat, a man in heavy clothes, muffled to his throat with a heavy blanket, which went round his neck in many folds, and with a broad-brimmed hat pulled over his eyes. The conductor saw nothing of the man's face, but of his nose and the shaggy length of hair which fell down on his breast; a grizzled and unkempt, and in keeping with the general tramp-like air of the stranger.

"Look's queer," thought the conductor, as the man fumbled in his pocket for the ticket pasteboard. "I'll keep an eye on him. Isn't drunk, but may be crazy, or something away. I wonder what from, poor fellow!" and punching the ticket, the kind-hearted conductor passed on.

"Don't care if I never see you again. It was a bad day for me when I saw you last."

Those were the words, which over and over beat like the blows of a hammer on Morris Onslow's brain, as the wind blew, the rain fell, and through the black night the train forged on.

Lizzie had spoken then. Lizzie, his wife whom he loved, whom he had worshipped, whom, poor fellow, being one of the pathetic men born to ill luck and bad fortune, he could not support. Morris Onslow, to save his life, could not rise to the rank of a clerkship, and a small one at that. He was honest, but not quick nor clever, given to day-dreams, not given to saving, nor to making money, nor to any of the things in which most Americans are so expert. Given plenty of this world's goods, an inherited patrimony, and Morris Onslow, have been charming and lovable. As it is, his constant want of success embittered him, and in the household the man who had borne much and been cheery and patient, became discouraged, too. He fled out of the window, and there were quarrels and recriminations, culminating one day in Lizzie's speaking with passionate vehemence the words I have quoted, and Morris's flinging out of the house in a tempest of anger, and with only a confused feeling hardening into resolve, that he would go away and never return.

That night, and the storm, and the cars rattling on, on, on! No matter where, the faster off the better. Forge ahead, gallop locomotive with your soul of flame. Run onward, tireless wheels. Never mind Lizzie, back there, gazing into the rain-streaked street through the streaming pane. Never mind her, at the open door, peering out into the wet, wet highway. She said she didn't care if she never saw her husband again.

That is that sound, spoken in Morris's ears heard through the roar of the storm and the rumble of the train. Heard oh! so plainly.

"Mamma, why doesn't Papa turn and tell me that my prayers, and tell me a story. I've been good, Mamma. Where is my Papa?"

"No, Mamma, you are for day-times, Papa's for night-times. I want my fader to tell me that, 'Now I lay me.'"

Nobody else acted as if there was anything strange in the car, but the passenger in the rear seat felt as if all the world were to see his crippled, wee Willie in his night-gown and hear him pleading for his father's return.

"I always undressed the kid, and put him to bed myself," he murmured apologetically in the depths of the grizzled beard. And he pushed the slouch hat farther from his forehead, and a pair of blue eyes, tender as a woman's, looked at the rows of men and women before him.

In the fifth seat to the left, a lady was getting her golden-haired baby to sleep. The little one was weary. She wanted to go home. But the mother cooed to her, and kissed her, and soothed her with soft touches, and sang under breath, but somehow the low tones penetrated the air, and filled it with melody.

Outside the rain fell, poured down in a cataract, the wind tore on its way like a mad giant let loose, the train through the night and the storm forged on.

"Now, my darling," said the traveling mother, "fold your two little hands, and say, 'Now I lay me,' and then mammy 'll tell you a story.'"

The train drew up at the station. It was not his station, that was hours and hours distant, but the passenger in the end seat slipped out and was gone. The darkness swallowed him up.

"Queer!" wondered the friendly conductor. "That poor Dick of a tramp has stepped out. Hope nothing'll happen to him."

Very late that night, long past midnight, Morris Onslow walked up the street and turned the latch-key in his door. He had caught a returning train. There was a light in the front room. In the back room Willie was at last asleep, tears on his pale cheek. As Morris opened the door, Lizzie ran to meet him, threw her arms around him, kissed him, clung to him.

"Thank God you're safe home, my darling," she cried. "Get off your wet coat; I've some supper for you, and we'll have hot coffee in a minute. Poor little Willie cried himself to sleep."

Outside, the wind, the rain, the tempest. But inside, peace and pardon and love. And in heaven, joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.

At Northfield.

Never before has Northfield, Mass., been so busy a scene as this year. The fame of the summer conferences has spread far and wide attracting every year a larger number of eager guests. Mr. Moody has placed every facility in the way of Christian people desiring to participate in the benefits of the conference. They have the choice of hotels or boarding-houses or tent life and they may if they choose bring their own tents and pitch them free of cost on the Seminary grounds. The leaders of the conference this year are eminent Biblical scholars and the hope expressed in Mr. Moody's invitation has been fulfilled.

The Cisamba Mission.

VIVID picture of missionary life in Africa is contained in a letter just received from Dr. W. T. Currie, who is laboring at Cisamba. After gratefully acknowledging a contribution from the fund placed in the hands of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by its readers, for distribution among foreign missionaries, Dr. Currie mentions several changes which have occurred at his station recently. One of these is the increase in the white population owing to the development of the country. There are now, he says, over sixty whites in the neighborhood, whereas when he began work there eight years ago, there were only eight whites, five of whom were missionaries. The change has involved the removal of some difficulties and has introduced others. Among the new ones is the opportunity afforded to the natives of increased income through the traders and also of obtaining rum which proves a great curse in Africa as elsewhere. Dr. Currie finds that there are natives now whose love for rum is so great that they would rather take it in exchange for their rubber than cloth or any other commodity. In view of this situation the missionary feels profound gratitude to God that he is able to report encouraging results in every department of the work.

Quite a little village has now sprung up around the missionary station inhabited by natives who have publicly professed faith in Christ and by adherents who are anxious to learn more of Christianity. The men have built for themselves neat, strong houses in rows outside the mission compound. There has been less sickness than in former years, but three deaths have occurred among the young converts which have caused much sorrow. One of them was of a very promising boy who was much beloved by all on the station. The parents were anxious to have the usual fetish ceremonies at the funeral but Dr. Currie eventually persuaded them to let the Christian boy have Christian burial.

The industrial department has been very successful. The boys have proved their capacity as carpenters, blacksmiths, gardeners, builders and cattle tenders. So skillful have they become that applications for their services are coming to the mission from native chiefs who are thus brought into contact with Christianity. This part of the work Dr. Currie is anxious to develop because it will keep the converts from the gipsy life of carriers, which takes them from under religious influence. He proposes to add if possible to the industrial work of the station a grist and flour mill which is sorely needed and will be of great benefit to all parties, relieving the women of the most laborious part of their work and removing the temptation to polygamy which generally comes from men desiring younger and stronger wives to do the labor of grinding corn.

The medical department has developed peculiar difficulties. Dr. Currie says:

We have been accustomed, until recently, to do all our medical work free; and to take what the people were disposed to give us in return. At first a number were accustomed to bring gifts of corn, meal, chickens, &c. Others not only refrained from doing so, but circulated reports more industriously than we could contradict them, that we did not want any return and that we were sent out and paid to do the work for them. Men began to come for medicine, and not only neglected to bring a gift, but even forgot to return the bottles and boxes in which they received their medicines. In time we found that drugs were, in some instances, carried away to be mixed with the mysterious compounds of the native doctors. In other cases, the patients took all we gave them free and paid the native doctors to treat them also, in order to get the supposed benefits of both treatments. If one failed the other ought surely to succeed. This was an evil under the sun! It endangered life, encouraged the growth of a pauper spirit, and wasted missionary money, given often by poor but generous and earnest Christians. We resolved, therefore, without making any sudden change which might alienate the people, to try quietly and steadily to bring all but the very poor and those settled at the station on to the list of those who pay something for the medical help they receive from us. As a result of the change we have received from natives, in small sums, during the past two months about eight dollars, and more gratitude and good will from all the patients than they were disposed to show us before, while the earnings of the department for the past twelve months have fully met all its necessities without the use of any grant from the society.

One Woman's Good Work.

This incident is related by a writer in The Woman's Missionary Friend, which contains a wholesome moral: A Christian woman went from Switzerland to live in Paraguay. She saw there the need of Christian education. She felt the spirit of the missionary stirring within her—but how should she begin her work alone?

The Swiss woman gained the confidence of her poor neighbors, and asked some of them to let her teach their children. She made for these a Swiss school which educates the heart and the imagination, and is a charm. It grew. The garden of children filled her heart with delight. She founded a mission in this far-away land. Christ was in the work and seemed to take these grateful little wanderers into his arms and bless them. A church is likely to be the end of the effort. What this woman did, many others can do.

In a Soudanese Camp.

RECLAIMING the Soudan for Egypt now appears to be the acknowledged object of the Anglo-Egyptian Expedition up the Nile. The battle at Ferkeh, previously described in these columns, has identically convinced the Sirdar and the governments in London and Cairo that the most feasible. The Anglo-Egyptian are to make an immediate advance on Kosheh, which they occupied after a battle, to a farther stage up the Nile. The press correspondents with the expedition have been forbidden to send dispatches until further orders, which is a sign that preparations for an advance are well forward. That there was any delay at Kosheh appears to have been only the condition of the river, which was too low to float the caissons of the expedition. The plan of employing native troops has not been fully proved, as they have not suffered from the heat so much as have the English officers. Their prominence, however, has caused a great deal of jealousy in the English regiments. One man voiced the sentiments of his regiment after the battle of Ferkeh, when he said that if he had known when he volunteered for service in the Soudan what was to be the lot of the generals commanding the expedition, he would have painted himself black and joined a Soudanese regiment. He would have given him an opportunity of fighting. As it is, the English regiments are for the most part merely holding the positions as they are won, and maintaining the line of communications. They live in huts of mud with a thick covering of straw, which are erected with astonishing rapidity by the expert Soudanese at each stopping place. The straw roof is the best protection possible from the sun, but even with this protection the heat is excessive. For weeks at a time, the thermometer in the middle of the camp has seldom fallen below 90°. The necessity of keeping open lines of communication is, however, of great importance. It is impossible to sustain an army in the country by any other means than supplies sent from Egypt. The success of the expedition thus far is almost entirely due to the efficiency of the Egyptian Service Corps which has charge of the supply. Every camp has all the comforts it is possible to enjoy in the desert. The soldiers are supplied with wholesome food cooked in the camp. One of the most interesting scenes is that of the open-air kitchen depicted in the illustration. The ovens are merely segments of iron pipes encased in mud or sun-dried bricks, and in these the Soudanese cooks are able to bake bread and do all their culinary work. It is satisfactory to learn that as the expedition advances, the proofs multiply that its success will mean deliverance to the people from a cruel tyranny. The rule of the Khalifa has been intolerably unjust, and oppressive. His officers are all drawn from the Baggara, the most ruthless and corrupt of all the Soudanese peoples, and they have had full license to plunder and outrage the peaceful villagers. The sufferings of the people under them have been extreme, and there was no redress. Devotion and extortion were practised without compunction. The people now pay no attention to the Khalifa's visions and prophecies of victory, and he has some difficulty in filling up the ranks of his army. The people are hoping for his defeat. It is as useless to rebel against a tyrant so powerful as the Khalifa, but it appears now as if they might be delivered by a power that is stronger than he. As Christ said of the enemy of the human race:

When a stronger than he shall come upon him and overcome him, he taketh from him all the armor wherein he trusted. (Luke 11:22.)

A Baby Held in Pawn.

A New York Justice of the Supreme Court was called on to decide a peculiar case a few days ago. The complainant was the mother of a child, who, she claimed, was being wrongfully withheld from her care. She and her husband had confided the child, when an infant, to a woman who agreed to bring it up in consideration of a payment of ten dollars a month. Both the father and the mother were employed in service which precluded the mother from caring for her child. Recently, however, the father secured a better job which enabled him to support his family without his wife's aid. They were to make a balloon ascent over the lake, or to have a captive balloon kept there. "Seen," he says, "from the height of a few hundred yards the bottom of a sheet of water is clearly visible as the fraction of light is nothing. It as if there were no water—nothing but air. At a height of two hundred yards a surface of several square miles would be in view and the bottom of the lake would be clearly seen." It is said that scientific men, who have been consulted, confirm the statement of the German engineer as to the transparency of water, when seen from a height, but the fact does not seem to have been generally known. We do know, however, that there are many things in life that are hidden and mysterious which we cannot discern until we get above the world into the clearer atmosphere of communion with God.

When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me, until I went into the sanctuary of God. (Ps. 73:16.)

A Mistake in a Hospital.

During the recent hot weather in New York when a large number of persons who had been prostrated by the heat were sent to the hospitals every day, two men were sent to Gouverneur Hospital. One of them was the driver of a wagon belonging to a grain merchant. Hearing of his prostration, his employer, who had a hearty love for his child, went to the hospital to make a balloon ascent over the lake, or to have a captive balloon kept there. "Seen," he says, "from the height of a few hundred yards the bottom of a sheet of water is clearly visible as the fraction of light is nothing. It as if there were no water—nothing but air. At a height of two hundred yards a surface of several square miles would be in view and the bottom of the lake would be clearly seen." It is said that scientific men, who have been consulted, confirm the statement of the German engineer as to the transparency of water, when seen from a height, but the fact does not seem to have been generally known. We do know, however, that there are many things in life that are hidden and mysterious which we cannot discern until we get above the world into the clearer atmosphere of communion with God.

hold her and he called to the other children to go for a man. They did so and two men were quickly on the scene and hauled the child to the surface. People who puzzle themselves about the part of the divine and the human in salvation may find this a helpful illustration. The boy had not the power to save the child, but he could put her in a position in which she could be saved. That is all that the most eloquent preacher or the most earnest worker can do for souls.

How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? (Rom. 10:14.)

To Protect the Trees.

An ingenious method of protecting large trees from the ravages of caterpillars is described in a Boston journal. It says: Circling the trunks of trees with some sticky substance to prevent noxious insects from ascending to the leaves is a familiar method of protection which has been applied on a large scale in the pine forests of Germany. Formerly the pine moth was a most destructive and dreaded enemy of those valuable forests, but now it is no longer feared. The caterpillars of the pine moth, being born at the end of August, do very little damage before the autumn frosts set in and compel them to go into winter quarters in the moss-carpeted ground at the foot of the trees. But in the spring, unless interfered with, they ascend the trunks and fall upon the green needles with ravenous appetite. It is estimated that a single caterpillar consumes, on the average, a thousand pine needles. By scraping a smooth band in the rough bark around each tree-trunk, and then smearing the band with a mixture of tar, grease and glue, an insurmountable obstacle is presented to the caterpillars, and in this simple manner the great pine forests of middle and northern Germany have been securely fortified against their insect enemies. It seems a pity to disfigure the noble trees by scraping them and smearing them with the greasy abomination, but that is a small matter if it will save the trees from destruction. Something like this often happens in human lives. Men of eminent character have to bear an infirmity or to go through a bitter humiliation to keep them from a worse evil. Even the Apostle Paul had to undergo this discipline to keep him from being proud.

Let I should be exalted above measure there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me. (1 Cor. 12:7.)

going to housekeeping, and the mother wanted her child. When she applied for it, the woman who had it in charge refused to give it up until a hundred dollars, arrears in its board, was paid. The mother contended that she did not owe so much, and she could not pay it, if she did. But she wanted her child, and appealed to the law for its recovery. Her lawyer obtained a writ of habeas corpus, in response to which the child was brought into court and the story of its detention was told. The Justice promptly decided that the child must be given to the mother. Though any kind of property might be kept as security for a debt, he said children could not be so held. The parents might be sued at law for their debt, but their child must be given up. The decision was just, though their creditor complained of it. We may be thankful that the same law prevails in spiritual matters. The negligence or carelessness of parents often cause a child to become a captive of the evil one, but he cannot retain it if it appeals to Christ for deliverance.

Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. (Rom. 10:13.)

A Search by Balloon.

A remarkable suggestion has been made by a German engineer to the owners of the steamer Chicora, which foundered in Lake Michigan in January, 1895. The firm spent large sums of money in the attempt to locate the steamer with the view of raising her, but hitherto without success. A German engineer having heard of their failure, has written them, advising a novel method of search. He proposes liking for his man, went around to the hospital in the evening to inquire after him. One of the overworked officials referred to the register, and finding out the ward and the number of the bed to which the man had been sent, directed a boy to go up and ascertain how the man was progressing. The employer was much shocked when the boy returned with the news that the man was dead. He left with the authorities the address of his family and then went to their home to break the sad news to them. The body was to be sent around the next day and an undertaker was told to be in readiness. Friends were notified and all arrangements made for interment. The next day the body arrived, but when the parents of the dead man dried their eyes to take a last look at his features they declared that it was not the body of their son. If any corroboration of their statement had been necessary, it was supplied when the man himself walked in, quite recovered from his seizure. In the press of work at the hospitals a mistake of identity had occurred and the doctors did not know one man from the other. The parents, however, could not be deceived. Sometimes such mistakes are made as to spiritual identity. Both the church and the world are often mistaken as to who are children of God. It is, however, consolatory to remember that the mistake does not extend beyond this world.

The Lord knoweth them that are his. (1 Tim. 2:19.)

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

A Mexican Holiday.

January as a Month for "Outing" Parties in the Southern Republic.

EXICO City is to the true native of our sister Republic what Paris is to the loyal son or daughter of the Republic across the sea. They have a saying that "outside of Mexico all is Cuatitlan," meaning that whatever does not belong to the capital city is rural, inconsequential and hardly worth a moment's notice. Cuatitlan is a village twenty-five miles north of the metropolis, to which the people go when they desire to indulge in certain sports that are prohibited in town—bull-fighting for example. Strange that those elegant, mild-eyed senoras should be partial to such amusements, yet the love of bull-fighting seems inherent in the national character. There are other suburbs much more picturesque and attractive to the visitor who may be sight-seeing, however. San Angel, Tlalpam, and several other points within easy distance of the capital still show evidences of extensive villa life, but the "art of living in the country," in the most refined sense, seems to have somewhat declined. In our American sense of the term, there are no watering-places or summer resorts. Haciendas or elegant country-houses there are in plenty, however, but there are no fierce heats to drive the population out-of-town to such places, and even in the summer, many of the country-houses are vacant. Still, the suburban towns and villages have a social life of their own and the residents celebrate "feasts of flowers," hold fairs and similar gatherings, sometimes lasting a week at a time.

A lovely suburban retreat is Santa Anita, which is a great favorite with picnic and boating parties, the wide canal and its sloping, verdurous banks offering advantages for this sort of enjoyment. Along this same canal of La Viga, are numerous hamlets, more or less like Santa Anita, each with its pretty country houses and graceful palm-trees, and these afford agreeable resting-places to visitors. There are few pleasanter ways of spending a holiday than in a little trip of this character.

Now and then, a section of fashionable society in the capital betakes itself to rural scenes at certain seasons of the year, which to our northern notions would seem to be most untimely. Our illustrations on this page show how our neighbors pass the time on such occasions. One of the favorite relaxations is the "Kermesse," a term borrowed from the German. The particular "Kermesse" with which our photographs are associated, took place at Tivoli, a suburb of the capital, in January, when our northern latitudes are snow-bound, though the sunny soil of Mexico then puts forth some of its choicest blooms. Booths were erected and a variety of fancy articles sold, concerts were given by amateur talent and the proceeds were devoted to the Guatemala Association for the benefit of the hospitals and charitable institutions. One of the photographs shows a group of young ladies belonging to leading families in the capital, with their mothers and friends, in the centre. All, save the leader, are in holiday attire and the hall is prettily decorated with flowers and vines. In the other picture are the guests of the party, who have gathered in a hall, with the orchestra, with guitars, flutes and violins. It is a pleasant way of spending an outing in the Capital city, particularly as the result is to aid worthy benevolences.

In Persian Homes.

To see the homes of the Persian people, writes Dr. George Donaldson, who has traveled much in that country, it is necessary to go within the city walls. There, those who can afford it have some trees and flowers in the centre of the square, which is surrounded by a walk, and two sides of which are inclosed by the low one-story house, with rooms opening out upon the garden. Should we enter the house, we would find the floor covered with pretty carpets and rugs which serve as seats to squat upon, tables to set the food and dishes upon, and beds in which a mattress is unrolled for sleeping purposes. As there is no wood in this country except the fruit trees and vines, and a little pop-between the nearest relations. Many of these evils arise from the authority which vain women possess of deciding upon fashions. They look upon all those who wish to preserve gravity and simplicity of manners, as antiquated. Study to make your daughters understand that the honor which is derived from good conduct, and from true capacity, is more estimable than that which is drawn from the dressing of the head or from the figure.

A Child-Bride's Presents.

When Bai, the daughter of the Hindu Rani, was married in her 12th year, to a noble spouse of 20, writes a lady missionary, a list of everything she had, including her presents, was given to her. Carpets were spread on the ground in the court of the Rani's palace, under the red cloth canopy which was arranged for the marriage. In the center stood a table with the jewels, and at a short distance from the table on the carpet, the display of silver was prettily arranged. A small silver table about one foot high, a large silver urn for holding drinking water—about ten or twelve quarts—trays and dishes, two silver sceptres and one gold one, a beautiful silver bedstead, covered with a green and purple velvet mattress and pillows of velvet, and each post tied with a silver cord and tassels. The bride and groom sat on this while the Rajahs and people of note came your thoughts. If you have time alone for a little while, then the best are fond of, or the prayer you wish can be attended to, but God will be with you and placed you where you who can read the heart, though you understands that to do what you findeth to do is worship."

Weary in Well-Doing.

I would have gone; God bade me so
I would have worked; God bade me so
He broke my will from day to day,
He read my yearnings unexpressed
And said them nay.

Now I would stay; God bids me go
Now I would rest; God bids me so
He soothes my heart, tossed to and fro
My soul is wrung with doubts that vex
And vex it so.

I go, Lord, where thou sendest me;
Day after day I plod and moil;
But, Christ, my God, when will it be
That I may let alone my toil,
And rest in thee?

A DOLL AS A PEACE-MAKER.

NOT often does it fall to the lot of a doll to fill the high office of peace-maker, as was the case with one that had been sent from an American State to the little daughter of an Apache army officer, at a frontier post, some time ago. A large party of armed Apaches had left the reservation and were on the warpath. The commanding officer at the post had been in vain to bring them back. One day a little Indian papoose of three and four years—strayed away from his father's wigwam, and found by a soldier near the fort. She was sobbing for her "lost child," and he took her to the fort. She would not be comforted by the soldier, and was a pretty child, and the commander was interested in her. One of the officers, after listening awhile to her outburst of grief, could no longer, and sent her the doll that had been received by his own little daughter. She placed it in her arms, sobbing papoose. Her face brightened, and she gave an astonished look at the doll, as was given to understand she could keep it awhile. She fell asleep that night with the beautiful doll in her arms. When morning came she was happy the moment she opened her eyes and saw her little companion. She held it, rocked it, talked to it as any little white child would do. The soldiers hoped her parents would come or send after her, but they did not appear.

Several days passed, and the soldiers decided that the little papoose must be taken back to her family. The doll in her arms, she started with her protectors for the Apache wigwam. As she reached the tribe with her doll, she created the greatest excitement. The warriors left the child with her mother, and returned to the fort. The next day the little papoose's mother appeared at the fort with the doll to return it. She was received with kindness and made to understand that her little daughter was to have the doll. The result was that the soldier's kindness and courtesy created a change of feeling among the wondering Indians, and led to negotiations which resulted in a war party going quietly back to the reservation, set apart for them by the United States Government, without any trouble.

"Saying What You Think."

It isn't always wise or judicious, and is sometimes positively cruel to be outspoken. When you hear a girl declare always say what I think," you may depend upon it, she has little respect for the feelings of others. "When she makes such a remark, (writes an observer) she feels that she has given herself a license to say what she pleases and you must look out for her. No girl gives it to her; she takes it. She for the Apostle's injunction. The girl says what she thinks, never seems to think kind things, or if she does, she fails to say what she thinks that time lar which is grown for shade, lumber is very expensive, and is not used in buildings except for doors, windows and supports for the roof; it is used very sparingly in these places, and the doors are made very low. Dried cow dung is the common fuel, but the wealthy buy the trimmings and roots of the trees and grape vines. All the straight wood is used for buildings and furniture.

Fashion and Morals.

Vanity, the love of dress and the desire for continual novelty, writes a Christian philosopher, unite together to destroy all distinctions and wholly derange the morals of a nation. As soon as restraint is set aside in dress or in furniture, affectation only remains; and for the tables of individuals, it is what public authority can still less influence; each chooses according to his fortune, or rather without fortune, according to his ambition and his vanity. This ambition is the ruin of families, which brings with it corruption of morals. On the one side ambition excites in persons of low birth the passion of speedily acquiring a fortune, which they cannot do without sin, as the Holy Spirit assures us. On the other side, persons of quality finding themselves without resources, are guilty of wickedness and meanness to support their expenses; by which they themselves extinguish honor, faith, integrity, and good feeling, even in and presented their gifts of money in gold and silver. (The bride sat veiled and her husband received the gifts for her). Then there were bags of rupees near the silver table, containing in all forty thousand rupees in cash. The bags were made of clean white cloth, and each held about two thousand rupees. Next came the clothing—sixty suits for the bride! Those large skirts trimmed with gold lace and lovely chuddas or veils made of pretty, thin material, excited much admiration.

Blue Days and Bright Days.

There are days that are bright and days that are blue in every woman's life. Concerning the latter, Ruth Ashmore writes: "You get up a little late, and if you stop to say the prayers that you usually do you can't help the children to dress. What ought you to do? Kneel down for a minute and reverently ask God's help during the day, and thank him for his care during the night. Then go to your work. Go to it in a cheerful mood and it will come the easier to your hand. Don't do it sullenly, don't do it as if it were a trouble, but do it cheerfully as a sister should. Later on, different duties arise, and do not shirk one. I feel like saying many times that there is nothing so pleasing to God as work that is done cheerfully; it is a prayer of deeds. Try throughout the day to speak the kindly word, and be charitable even in

The Tongue for Christ.

Pages on the Christian Endeavor Topic
Week Beginning September 13.
1-28.

OR good or evil the tongue is an effective instrument. True, the source of the good or the evil lies back of it in the heart. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Before the tongue can be effectively harnessed in Christ's service the heart must be cleansed. The tongue uses the instrument to be a good power. An instrument can do no good. But how potent is the tongue! We are apt to estimate the importance of its influence in our lives. Our actions are nearly so influential. A phemous ejaculation, a story, the irreverent angry retort, the reproach, the cruel lie, the wicked lie, will do irreparable. In the store and the tongue is doing its service that is rendering the benefits that are often neutralized by the word or the bit of speech. One nagging, contentious woman can make a whole household miserable and render the almshouse. The heart of a brother or a sister wound as deeply as a sword and had wielded a tongue the heart bleeds with an anguish that could not know. "Words," we sometimes hear sounds that break but how potent is the significant fact that the tongue is often the last of the nature to yield to sin. How often do we see a man or the woman who do great things and make sacrifices, incapable of controlling the tongue. Some time, some petty vexation, a stupid blunder of an errand messenger, the carelessness of an untrained servant, all provoke utterances from a Christian which inflict harm. It is very difficult to bring the tongue under control, as every one who has made the attempt James held that he could control the tongue of a perfect man, and able to control the whole body. In addition it was the most rebellious of all the members—a fire, a world of sin. Yet how much good can come from a tongue brought under control and consecrated to Christ! It is an instrument worth most pains and the most untiring diligence. The consecrated tongue may never preach, but it can do in the home, service as effective as it could do in public. The tongue that has kindly words for the troubled, that is never provoked to bitterness, that will not be betrayed into uncharitableness, it is no piercing, wounding words, it is never guilty of impatience or inconsiderate fretfulness is a treasure, which is within sound of it, never fail to appear. Here is an opportunity for Christians who deplore the poverty or the lack of sympathy which excludes them from prominent spheres of usefulness. If they cannot go to churches and colleges; if they cannot preach the Gospel at home or to the world, then they can at least speak kindly words. None are too ignorant to do that. It is a privilege in which few are engaged, yet how many brighten dull lives!

AT EVENING TIME.

At evening time it shall be light:
Dark, darker grows the day,
The shades foretell the coming night.
The cheery sunbeams, golden bright,
Have slowly died away.
At evening time thy light shall rise.
Oh, patient, trustful heart!
Oh, loved of God, lift up thine eyes:
His starlight shall soon gem the skies.
The gloom shall yet depart.
At evening time thy soul shall see
The Lord thy God is love:
When lingering hopes 'mid shadow flee
He shall eternal sunshine be—
At evening time, when all grows dim,
And trembling prayers arise.

When oft the wistful tears o'erbrim,
Then, heavy laden, come to him,
Who wipes the weeping eyes.
At evening time, from fear set free
Thy song of praise shall ring:
The pity of the Lord shall be
A lamp of gold that burns for thee,
Thy footstep home to bring.
At evening time the bells of peace
Adown thy road shall peal:
The Lord will bid thy sorrow cease.
And grant thee from thy load release:
Thy heartache he will heal.
At evening time it shall be light.
In God's assurance rest!
Thou shalt not grope in lonely night:
His mercy—his love—his love—his love—
Steal sunward to his breast.

Prophetic Parables.

The Parable of the Sower an Initial Stage in the Condition of the Church.

BY REV. GEO. H. PEMBER, M.A.

THE scene which opens before us is a large field already plowed and prepared for sowing. On one side of it runs a road, over which the wayfarers and wagons have passed so heedlessly that they have trodden down and pressed the bordering plowed land, until it has become well-nigh as hard as the highway itself. Extending underneath a considerable portion of the field lies a slab of rock, with but little soil above it; so that this part is quickly dried up by the sun. A third portion has rich and deep mould, but abounds in thorn-roots and seeds: the remainder of the field consists in soil both clean and good.

Presently the sower comes, and scatters his seed broadcast over the furrows. Some of it falls upon the trodden ground near the highway, and lies exposed upon its hard and smooth surface. Possibly it might yet sink into the soil, if it could be left untouched till heavy rains set in; but there is no chance of that. Multitudes of little birds are on the watch, and, as soon as the sower's back is turned, snatch up and devour every grain.

Some seed, again, falls upon the rocky soil, and being unable to sink far beneath the surface, quickly sends forth blades of promise. But the sun arises in his strength, and they soon wither and die; for the thin-spread mould is speedily reduced to dust. Other seed is scattered over the place already occupied by the thorn-roots: it comes up well, but the thorns also appear with it. It is not injured by the sun, for it has depth of soil; but the ever-increasing weeds draw away its nourishment and take up its room, until, almost concealed by their luxuriant growth, it becomes sickly and thin, and cannot bring its fruit to perfection.

But the seed which falls upon good ground puts forth its blades in due time, and grows and produces much fruit, though in varying quantities: some grains a hundred-fold, some sixtyfold, and some thirtyfold.

This parable exhibits the first period of the Gospel dispensation. The ploughed field is the world prepared for the reception of Christ by previous dealings of God: the untilled highway is the bordering Kingdom of the Air, tenanted by those fallen angels and spirits to whom the offers of Christ were not extended; so that their realm is neither plowed nor sown. The Sower is, first and principally, the Lord Jesus himself, and, afterwards, those who succeeded him in the work of carrying on all that he began to do and to teach. The seed is the glorious word of the Gospel: the various conditions of soil represent the four classes of hearers which are found among men. And the fact that but one of these brings forth the desired fruit is a hint, at the very outset of the discourse, that all expectations of the universal success of the Gospel in the present age are false; that the way of the strait gate will remain narrow, and only a few, comparatively, find it, until a change be brought about by the advent of the King.

Thus was the world sown in the first age of the Church: and during this time the prominent characteristic of the followers of Christ was an earnest propagation of their faith in every land; though, after all, their efforts were baffled.

Running the Gauntlet.

"How I ought not to speak twice on the question," said Deacon Slowfoot, "but I am ready to vote for it. The old pastor now, is too much for our old pastor now, and it is only kind to take some of it off his shoulders. Since you propose to promote him honorably, I agree."

There was no further opposition. Deacon Slowfoot's withdrawal left Dr. Jones' and without a leader, and his discharge was finally voted by a large majority.

"I suppose it is all right," remarked an elder as he left the meeting, "but the age of young men. We shall see what they will do. The Church, like the world, is resolved on making the exception. For my part, I do not feel so sure that a young man at the helm as I do of a man who has learned by experience. I am sorry for Dr. Jones, too. But things have been worse. That Paramore had no compunction in turning his back to drift to starve."

The next thing the Church had to do was to find the young man who could lead the Church a paying speculation by his pews and attracting the young people. After having several probationers, the invitation was finally sent to the Rev. Eodius Hellings, a preacher who had been in his favor, and the not uncommon of making a little thought fill a large crowd by dressing it up in high-sounding words and long words, which, if they were precisely fit the meaning, could be made to reverberate with thrilling effect. The new pastor did not find himself in a position for the harvest. On the contrary, the members had become very old, family altars were neglected, and sincere prayer, and the lifting up of hands, which the Psalmist compares to the incense, or as the evening prayers were conspicuous by their absence. Mr. Hellings preached and worked, prayed and hoped, he expected; but he never came without any favorable impression being perceptible in the spiritual life of his people; although both the school and Church had largely increased in the average attendance. Being of an ardent, he expected great results from his maiden efforts, and perhaps did too much upon himself; his fine career well rounded periods.

"I am very discouraging," said Mr. Hellings. Mrs. Seymour, one evening in the church, "to see no result to my labors. Paramore can I do to win souls to Christ."

"I can," replied the widow, "be patient and wait. 'Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit,' saith the Lord. I would suggest that we hold special meetings to ask God for the outpouring of his Spirit."

"I think the suggestion is wise," said the disabled young man. "I will speak to Mr. Plummer and one or two others, and if they will co-operate."

Therefore the suggestion could be carried into effect, the town was called to go through a solemnizing experience. A contagious and fatal disease broke out in the town, which the physicians were unable to control, and a score of poor people perished, and several died of it. The disease was pronounced "ship fever," and was supposed to have been brought by a ship who came from Philadelphia, and died after a short illness in the almshouse near Brookdale.

The young minister, Mr. Hellings, was very tentative to the sick, as were his wife and friends in the church. By his advice, an unoccupied house was made into a hospital, and patients, when taken with the early symptoms, were removed thither for treatment. A fund was raised to purchase whatever might be wanted for the sufferers, and the people of the Church became excellent nurses. Among those who daily went to the hospital, carrying delicacies, medicine, etc., for the sick, was a girl of twenty years old, a teacher in the town school, named Mary Burch, — a devoted girl. When the disease seemed to be on the wane, and the worst danger to have passed, she suddenly contracted it in the most virulent form and in two days, had passed away to the Spirit-land! She was a sweet character beloved by everybody, and the sunshine and joy of her parent's house; but neither love nor prayer availed to save her from death. The death caused a profound sensation in the town and Pastor Hellings labored earnestly to turn the impression to practical account with his people.

The funeral service, held on the afternoon of the Lord's Day, was one that Brookdale is not likely to forget. The coffin was uncovered in front of the pulpit, and the once animated form, now even more beautiful in the icy embrace of death, lay there covered with flowers, so that those who loved her might take the last view of the sweet face, soon to be committed to the tomb.

From the first, a solemn stillness pervaded the place, and the hearts of all present were softened, so that when Mr. Hellings arose, and in subdued voice announced his text: "The maid is not dead, but sleeping," there were but few hearts in the crowded room that did not melt into tenderness.

After a short and impressive sermon, the choir was to sing: "The Dying Christian's Ode to his Soul," and, as Miss Burch had been a member of the choir, (which was shrouded in mourning out of respect for her), it seemed an appropriate hymn to sing at her funeral, especially as it was one of her favorite pieces of music. The voices from the start were weak and tremulous, and the singing had not proceeded far when one voice ceased in an outburst of tears. Soon after this another, completely overcome with emotion, stopped singing, and then the voices of two or three others suddenly were silenced, and nobody but the leader sang. Finally, the organist deeply affected stopped playing, and the wave of emotion swept through the crowded assembly.

There was an interval of silence broken only by sobs. Then Pastor Hellings announced the hymn beginning:

Come ye disconsolate, where'er you languish,
Come at the mercy seat fervently kneel,
Here bring your wounded hearts, here tell your anguish,
Earth has no sorrow that heaven cannot heal.

There was silence for a few moments and then neither organ nor choir taking up the duty, Mrs. Seymour sang the words in a deep rich voice, one or two of the audience joining in. The first verse was finished and the sweet voice ceased awhile, but not other leader aking up the strain, the widow went on:

Joy of the comfortless, light of the straying,
Hope when all others die, fadeless and pure,
Here speaks the comforter in God's name saying,
Earth has no sorrow that heaven cannot cure.

It was a solemn moment. On one side of her Milton sat holding her hand in his quivering grasp, and on the other little Carrie Walter stood having crossed the church to her side. The child had thrown her arm around her teacher's neck and was weeping silently.

Mrs. Seymour could sing no more. Pastor Hellings offered an earnest prayer and then having invited any who were desirous of seeking Christ to remain, dismissed the congregation.

Skill and Wisdom of Ants.

When the wise King advised the slothful man to go to the ant for an example of industry, he evidently knew a good deal about the habits of that remarkable little insect, whose intelligence and skill have astonished students and mechanicians in all ages. It has lately been learned that the finest engineers in the world, considering their size, are certain South American ants. Tunnels constructed by them have been traced a distance of two miles, one of them passing under a stream fifty yards wide. South African ants have also considerable mechanical skill, as in some of their subterranean homes have been found suspended bridges passing from one gallery to another and spanning gulfs eight to ten inches wide.

Have You Asthma or Hay-Fever?

Medical science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma and Hay-fever in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that it cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing, and Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay-fever season, being unable to lie down night or day. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To make the matter sure, these and hundreds of other cures are sworn to before a notary public. So great is their faith in its wonderful curative powers, the Kola Importing Co., of 1164 Broadway, New York, to make it known is sending out large cases of the Kola compound free to sufferers from Asthma and Hay-fever. All they ask in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. Send your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

DO IT TO-DAY!

The phenomenal sale of The Encyclopedic Dictionary has puzzled the world and reduced some of our disappointed competitors to a state of jealous frenzy.

COST $750,000 TO MAKE IT.

The secret of this tremendous success may be told in two words—unapproachable superiority. Five times our introductory prices were advanced, and with each advance our sales doubled many times over. Why? Because each delighted buyer becomes a living advertisement, and by his willing and hearty commendation influences other orders. Otherwise the $200,000 we have spent in advertising might have been wasted.

of this unrivalled self-instructor. THOROUGHLY REVISED TO JUNE 1, 1896, and printed from new plates never before on press. This new edition is not only a peerless reference work—the only one in the world that is strictly up-to-date—but is also a genuine triumph of art. It contains all the newest words, phrases and definitions in use to-day; also, more than 700 superb new illustrations, in seventeen colors and in monotone, comprising 54 elegant single and double pages of engravings—the most attractive and expensive art work ever made for any reference book; together with other special new features of the utmost importance and educational value. These extensive improvements have added thousands upon thousands of dollars to an original investment of three quarters of a million; hence it is not to be expected that we can furnish our beautiful new edition for less than regular prices—$42 to $70 a set.

UNTIL OCTOBER 1

Nevertheless, in accordance with our well-known and popular methods of introduction, we have determined to give early applicants one grand opportunity to secure this great practical self-educator at less than half price, and upon terms so easy as to place it, for the time being, within the reach of everybody. This is an opportunity not to be neglected by any ambitious mechanic, engineer, electrician, machinist, inventor, apprentice, student, farmer, merchant, professional man or housewife. Until October 1st only, this latest and greatest of all home libraries will be supplied to any reader of this paper on payment of Dictionary in existence, and contains thousands of words not found in any other reference book. Among these are such very recent coinages as "vitamin," "phonograph," "phonoscope," and scores of other terms recently called into existence by the progress of modern science and now forming a necessary part of every scholar's vocabulary. It gives the history, derivation, spelling, pronunciation, and varied meanings of every legitimate English word, past and present. Compared with this thoroughly up-to-date publication, even the latest of other reference works is years behind the age.

of all Encyclopedias, because the most practically useful, as well as the latest and highest in scholarship. Just think of it! The whole range of human knowledge condensed for your convenient use by such world-famous scientists as Huxley, Proctor, Morris, Etcolet, and a hundred other educators of hardly less renown. A time-saver for the busy mechanic, engineer, electrician, or inventor; a brain-developer for the plodding student; a technical education for the ambitious apprentice; an inimitable treasure-house of knowledge for each member of the family; a helpful companion for the most profound and finished scholar. Nothing can fill its place.

EXAMINE IT FOR YOURSELF BEFORE BUYING.

We earnestly desire comparison with any and all of the best reference books published. This great work easily takes the place of any half-dozen others that could be named. It is truly a family necessity. Investigate thoroughly before you purchase. Note that our terms give you ten days in which to make a thorough examination. Could anything be more fair?

HOW TO SECURE THIS GREAT BARGAIN.

Send $1.00, and the entire four volumes will be forwarded. Every month thereafter send $1.50 for twelve months, and the set will be yours. If you prefer to pay in advance, the price of this set is $12.00. If the Half-Russia style is desired, the price is $14.00. The first payment in any case is only One Dollar. Any one wishing to pay all at once, or in installments, will find it to their advantage to do so. We always recommend the Half-Russia binding as the most serviceable. The first payment of $1.00 is sent after the first payment of $1.00, which gives you the use of them for a month. All freight or express charges must be paid by purchaser. We refer to any Bank, any Newspaper, or any Commercial Agency in Philadelphia.

Books guaranteed as represented or money refunded if returned within 10 days.

80 Specimen Pages, Beautifully Illustrated, FREE for 10c. to pay postage.

REMEMBER! This great special offer is made to readers of this issue only. An investment aggregating nearly a million dollars demands an adequate return; and we cannot afford, even for advertising purposes, to furnish many sets of our expensive new edition for less than regular prices—$42 to $70. You may not see this announcement again; therefore act now, and make sure of this opportunity of a lifetime. When ordering, please mention this paper.

Li Hung Chang's Welcome.

Great Chinese Statesman's Visit to the United States
—His Impressions of America.

RARELY has New York's magnificent harbor presented so animated and picturesque a scene as it did on the forenoon of August 28. Bright sunshine and cooling breezes contributed to make the perfect as the heart could wish. A long line along the lower bay, leaving a wide channel between, lay the splendid vessels of the Atlantic Squadron, with bunting, and flying countless flags, among which the great dragon of China loomed conspicuous. On either side of the channel were miles and miles of steam and sailing craft, excursion boats, tugs, launches and yachts, many of them with bunting. And when, at last, the huge and stately ocean liner, St. Louis, came Major Davis and Capt Mills, in resplendent uniforms, Assistant Secretary Rockhill and the Chinese Minister. They were transferred to the big liner and Li Hung Chang was then informed that the costume to honor the occasion. As he entered the salon, the Americans gazed at him in well-bred surprise. His jacket was of golden yellow silk, loosely made. From his waist hung a number of skirts or sections of silk all of different shades of blue, and upon his head rested a dark blue hat or cap, with a wide, upturned brim that made it look like a turban. The top of this hat, which was red, was jauntily decorated with a three-eyed peacock plume indicating high rank. Interpreted through Chinese etiquette, the whole costume conveyed the official respect and admiration of the wearer and his imperial master for this country and its ruler.

Li Hung Chang, surrounded by attendants all more or less picturesquely garbed, entered the salon leisurely and seated himself in a heavily-cushioned bamboo chair. Then an attendant hoisted above him a black silk umbrella, and the great Earl Li was ready for the ceremonial. Those who now met him for the first time, saw a dignified, elderly gentleman, noble in mien, some-shot inside of the Hook, the guns of the fleet belched forth a vociferous greeting, the guns of the land forts, from Wadsworth and Hamilton to Governor's Island, fired in unison, and a thousand screaming whistles on tug and steamer united in a concerted and deafening blast, expressive of the joy of the American people at welcoming to these shores the greatest living

City governments. The St. Louis was met in the lower bay by the little naval steamer, Dolphin, with a distinguished party on board, including Gen. T. H. Ruger, representing the President of the United States, accompanied by two miliover six feet in height and with broad but slightly stooping shoulders and a powerful frame. His features are grave but pleasant in expression, and his gold-bowed spectacles lend an air of judicial dignity to his strong face. THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

Full Corn=Cribs.

A Sermon by
Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Genesis 43: 3, { And Judah spake unto him saying, The man did solemnly protest unto us, saying, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you.

NOTHING to eat! Plenty of corn in Egypt, but ghastly famine in Canaan. The cattle moaning in the stall. Men, women, and children awfully white with hunger. Not the failing of one crop for one summer, but the failing of all the crops for seven years. A nation dying for lack of that which is so common on your table, and so little appreciated; the product of harvest-field and grist-mill and oven; the price of sweat and anxiety and struggle,—Bread! Jacob, the father, has the last report from the flour-bin, and he finds that everything is out; and he says to his sons, "Boys! hook up the wagons and start for Egypt, and get us something to eat." The fact was, there was a great corn-crib in Egypt. The people of Egypt have been largely taxed in all ages, at the present time paying between seventy and eighty per cent. of their products to the government. No wonder in that time they had a large corn-crib, and it was full. To that crib they came from the regions around about—those who were famished—some paying for the corn in money; when the money was exhausted, paying for the corn in sheep and cattle and horses and camels; and when they were exhausted, then selling their own bodies and their families into slavery.

The morning for starting out on the crusade for bread has arrived. Jacob gets his family up very early. But before the elder sons start they say something that makes him tremble with emotion from head to foot, and burst into tears. The fact was that these elder sons had once before been in Egypt to get corn, and they had been treated somewhat roughly, the lord of the corn-crib supplying them with corn, but saying at the close of the interview, "Now, you need not come back here for any more corn unless you bring something better than money—even your younger brother Benjamin." Ah! Benjamin—that very name was suggestive of all tenderness. The mother had died at the birth of that son—a spirit coming and another spirit going—and the very thought of parting with Benjamin must have been a heart-break. The keeper of this corn-crib, nevertheless, says to these elder sons, "There is no need of your coming up here any more for corn unless you can bring Benjamin, your father's darling." Now Jacob and his family very much needed bread; but what a struggle it would be to give up this son. The Orientals are very demonstrative in their grief, and I hear the outwailing of the father as these elder sons keep reiterating in his ears the announcement of the Egyptian lord, "Ye shall not see my face unless your brother be with you." "Why did you tell him you had a brother?" says the old man complaining and chiding them. "Why, father," they said, "he asked us all about our family, and we had no idea that he would make any such demand upon us as he has made." "No use of asking me," said the father, "I cannot tell you, like up Benjamin." The father's heart would melt, and he would have said, "I will give you all I have, but I will not give up Benjamin," and thus there has been bitterness in a household, and a child taken, it makes the other children in the household more precious. So the day for departure was adjourned and adjourned and adjoined. Still the horrors of the famine increased, and louder moaned the cattle, and wider open cracked the earth, and more pallid became the cheeks, until Jacob, in despair, cried out to his sons, "Take Benjamin and be off." The older sons tried to cheer up their father. They said, "We have strong arms and a stout heart, and no harm will come to Benjamin. We'll see that he gets back again." "Farewell!" said the young men to the father, in a tone of assumed good cheer. "F-a-r-e-w-e-l-l!" said the old man: for that word has more quavers in it when pronounced by the aged than by the young.

Well, the bread party, the bread embassy, drives up in front of the corn-crib of Egypt. Those corn-cribs are filled with wheat and barley and corn in the husk, for modern travelers in those lands, both in Canaan and in Egypt, tell us there is corn there corresponding with our Indian maize. Huzza! the journey is ended. The lord of the corn-crib, who is also the Prime Minister, comes down to these newly-arrived travelers, and says, "Dine with me to-day. How is your father? Is this Benjamin, the younger brother whose presence I demanded?" The travelers are introduced into the palace. They are worn and be-dusted of the way; and servants come in with a basin of water in one hand and a towel in the other, and kneel down before these newly-arrived travelers, washing off the dust of the way. The butchers and poulterers and caterers of the Prime Minister prepare the repast. The guests are seated in small groups, two or three at a table, the food on a tray; all the luxuries from imperial gardens and orchards and aquariums and aviaries are brought there, and are filling chalice and platter. Now is the time for this Prime Minister, if he has a grudge against Benjamin, to show it. Will he kill him, now that he has him in his hands? O, no! This lord of the corn-crib is seated at his own table, and he looks over to the tables of his guests; and he sends a portion to each of them, but sends a larger portion to Benjamin, or, as the Bible quaintly puts it, "Benjamin's mess was five times as much as any of theirs." Be quick and send word back with the swiftest camel to Canaan to old Jacob, that "Benjamin is well; all is well; he is faring sumptuously; the Egyptian lord did not mean murder and death; but he meant deliverance and life when he announced to us on that day, 'Ye shall not see my face unless your brother be with you.'"

Well, my friends, this word is famine-struck of sin. It does not yield a single crop of solid satisfaction. It is dying. It is hunger-bitten. The fact that it does not, cannot feed a man's heart was well illustrated in the life of the English comedian. All the world honored him—did everything for him that the world could do. He was applauded in England and applauded in the United States. He roused up nations into laughter. He had no equal. And yet, although many people supposed him entirely happy, and that this world was completely satisfying his soul, he sits down and writes :

I never came into put on a new hat that it looked new and bright. I never went out in a bubble, but because it was white and then, but all who had the blue would later indicate that the sun did not come out in its strength and bring out with it all the butterflies of fashion whom I knew and who knew me. I never consented to accept a part I hated out of kindness to another, that I did not get hissed by the public and cut by the writer. I could not take a drive for a few minutes with Terry without being overturned and having my elbow broken, though my friend got off unharmed. I could not make a covenant with Arnold, which I thought was to make my fortune, without making his instead, than in an incredibly short space of time—I think thirteen months—I earned for him twenty thousand pounds, and for myself one. I am persuaded that if I were to set up as a baker, everyone in my neighborhood would leave off eating bread.

That was the lament of the world's comedian and joker. All unhappy. The world did everything for Lord Byron that it could do, and yet in his last moment he asks a friend to come and sit down by him and read, as most appropriate to his case, the story of "The Bleeding Heart." Torrigiano, the sculptor, executed, after months of care and carving, "Madonna and the Child." The royal family came in and admired it. Everybody that looked at it was in ecstasy; but one day, after all that toil and all that admiration, because he did not get as much compensation for his work as he had expected, he took a mallet and dashed the exquisite sculpture into atoms. The world is poor compensation, poor satisfaction, poor solace. Famine, famine in all the earth; not for seven years, but for six thousand. But, blessed be God, there is a great corn-crib. The Lord built it. It is in another land. It is a large place. An angel once measured it, and as far as I can calculate it in one phrase, that corn-crib is fifteen hundred miles long and fifteen hundred miles broad, and fifteen hundred high; and it is full. Food for all nations. "Oh!" say the people, "we will start right away and get this supply for our soul." But stop a moment; for from the Keeper of that corn-crib there comes this word, saying, "You shall not see my face except your brother be with you." In other words, there is no such thing as getting from heaven pardon and comfort and eternal life unless we bring with us our Divine Brother, the Lord Jesus Christ. Coming without him we shall fall before we reach the corn-crib, and our bodies shall be a portion for the jackals of the wilderness; but coming with the Divine Jesus, all the granaries of heaven will swing open before our soul and abundance shall be given us. We shall be invited to sit in the palace of the King and at the table; and while the Lord of heaven is apportioning from his own table to other tables, he will not forget us; and then and there it will be found that our Benjamin's mess is larger than all the others, for so it ought to be. "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive blessing and riches and honor and glory and power."

I want to make three points. Every frank and common-sense man will acknowledge himself to be a sinner. What are you going to do with your sins? Have them pardoned, you say. How? Through the mercy of God. What do you mean by the mercy of God? Is it the letting down of a bar for the admission of all, without respect to character? Be not deceived. I see a soul coming up to the gate of mercy and knocking at the door, and a heavenly supply; and a voice from within says, "Are you alone?" The sinner replies, "All alone." The voice from within says, "You shall not see my pardoning face unless your divine Brother, the Lord Jesus, be with you." O, that is the point at which so many are disqualified. There is no mercy from God except through Jesus Christ. Coming with him, we are accepted. Coming without him, we are rejected. Peter put it right in his great sermon before the high priests, when he thundered forth, "Neither is there salvation in any other. There is no other name given under heaven among men whereby we may be saved." O, anxious sinner! O, dying sinner! O, lost sinner! all you have got to do is to have this divine Benjamin along with you. Side by side, coming to the gate, all the store-houses of heaven will swing before your anxious soul.

Am I right in calling Jesus Benjamin? O, yes. Rachel lived only long enough to give a name to that child, and in giving kiss she called him Benjamin. When Jacob changed his name, he called him Benjamin. The meaning of the name she gave was, "Son of my Right Hand." The meaning of the name the father gave was, "Son of my Right Hand." Am I not Christ the Son of God? All the sorrow of Rachel in that hour when she gave her child over into the hands of sinners, was as nothing compared with the struggle of God when he gave up his Son. And was not Christ appropriately called "Son of the Right Hand?" Am I not Stephen look into heaven and stand at the right hand of God? Does not Paul speak of him as standing at the right hand of God making intercession for us? O, Benjamin—Jesus! Spang! Son of victory! The deepest emotions of our souls ought to be stirred by the sound of that nomenclature. In your agonies you plead his tears, his sufferings, his sorrows, and his death. If you refuse to accept of him, the corn-crib and the palace of heaven will be bolted and barred against your soul, and a voice from the throne will say to you with the announcement, "I shall not see my face except you begin with me."

My text also suggests the reason so many people do not get any real comfort. You meet ten people; nine of them are in need of some kind of condolence. There is something in their health, in their state, or in their domestic condition that demands sympathy. And yet of the world's sympathy amounts to utterly nothing. People go to the weeper's crib, or they go in the wrong way. At the plague was in Rome, a great many years ago, there were eighty men who chanted themselves to death with the psalms of Gregory the Great—literally chanted themselves to death, and they did not stop the plague. And all the music of this world cannot halt the plague of the human heart. I come to some of whose ailments are chronic, and I say, "Heaven you will never be sick." It does not give you much comfort. And what you want is a soothing power for your present distress. Lost children, have I come to you and tell you that in ten years perhaps you will meet those who were once before the throne of God. But that is but little condolence in that. One year is a year with them, and ten years is but small eternity. What you want is sympathy now—present help. I come to you who you have lost dear friends, and say, "Try to forget them. Do not let the departed always in your mind." I can you forget them when every figure on the carpet and every book and every picture and every room calls out their names. Suppose I come to you and say by way of condolence, "God is wise." "Oh!" I say, "that gives me no help." Suppose I come to you and say, "God, from all eternity, has arranged this trouble." "Ah!" you say, "that does me no good." "I tell you, "With the swift feet of prayer, direct to the corn-crib for a heavenly supply." You go. You say, "Lord, help! Lord, comfort me." But no help yet, comfort yet. It is all dark. What is the matter? I have found. You ought to go to God and say, "Here, Oh Lord, are the wounds of my soul, and I bring with the wounded Jesus. Let his wounds be for my wounds, his bereavements for my bereavements, his loneliness for my loneliness, his heart-break for my heart-break. Oh, God! for the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ—the God, the man, the Benjamin—the brother—deliver my agonized soul." Jesus of the weary foot, ease my aching head, Oh, Jesus of the aching head, heal my aching head. Oh, Jesus of the Bethany sisters, roll away the stone from the door of the grave." That is the kind of prayer that brings help; and yet how many of you are getting no help at all, for the reason there is in your soul, perhaps, a secret trouble. You may never have mentioned it to a single human ear, or you may have mentioned it to some one who has now gone away, and that great sorrow is still in your soul. After Washington Irving was dead, they found a little box which contained a braid of hair and a miniature and the name of Matilda Hoffman and a memorandum of her death, and a remark something like this:

"The world after that was a blank to me. I went into the country, but found no peace in solitude. I tried to get into society, but I found no peace in society. There has been a horror haunting over me by night and by day, and I am afraid to be alone."

How many unuttered troubles among men. No human ear has ever heard that sorrow. O, troubled soul, I want to tell you there is one salve that can cure the wounds of the heart, and that is the salve that comes out of the tears of a sympathetic Jesus. And yet some of you will not take that salve; and you try chloral, and you try morphine, and you try strong drink, and you try change of scene, and anything but everything rather than to take the divine companionship and sympathy suggested by the words of my text when it says, "You shall not see my face again till you see my brother be with you." O, that this audience to-day might understand something of the height and depth and infinity of God's eternal consolations.

Go further and find in my subject a hint as to why so many people fail of heaven. We are told that heaven has seven gates, and some people infer from the fact that all the people will go in without reference to their past life; but what is the use of having a gate that is sometimes to be shut? The swinging of a gate implies that our entrance into heaven is conditional. It is not a monetary condition. If we come to the door of an exquisite concert we are not surprised that we must pay a fee, for we know that fine earthly music is expensive; but all the choros of heaven cost nothing. Heaven is nothing for its music. It is all free. There is nothing to be paid at that door of entrance; but the condition of getting into heaven is our bringing our divine Benjamin along with us. If we come up to the door of heaven at last, though we come from all luxuriance and brilliancy of surroundings, and knock for admittance, it is found that Christ is not with us, the police of heaven will beat us back from the bread-house, saying, "Depart, I never knew you."

Jacob's sons, coming toward Egypt, had lost everything on the way; if they had come up utterly exhausted to the granaries of Egypt, and it had been found that Benjamin was with them, all the gate-houses would have swung open before them. And so, though by fatal equality we may be ushered into the eternal world; though we may be weak, and exhausted by protracted sickness — if, in the last moment, we can only just stagger and faint and fall into the gate of heaven — seems that all the corn cribs of heaven are open for our need and all the palaces are open for our reception.

My friends, you see it is either Christ or amine. If there were two banquets spread, and to one of them, only, you might go, you might stand and think for a good while as to which invitation you should better accept; but here it is feasting or starvation. If there were two mansions offered, and you might have only one, you might think for a long while, saying, "Perhaps I had better accept this one, and perhaps I had better accept that one;" but here it is a choice between palaces of light and hovels of despair. If it were a choice between oratories, you might say, "I prefer the 'Creation,'" or, "I prefer the 'Messiah!'" But here it is a choice between eternal harmony and everlasting discord. O, will you live or die? Will you sail into the harbor or drive on the rocks? Will you start for the Egyptian granary, or will you perish amid the empty barns of the Canaanitish famine?

Li Hung Chang's Welcome.

where the President lived; what was Gen. Ruger's age and his exact official position in the army, and whether he (Li), would receive in advance copies of the addresses to be made at the various receptions, to all of which the General contrived to give satisfactory answers. Incidentally, Li remarked that he had been Asiatic diplomat at the American Line pier when the St. Louis steamed up to her dock. The Earl's party drove to the Hotel Waldorf. During the ride, the Earl carried on an animated talk with Mr. Rockhill in Chinese. He appeared particularly surprised at the tall business buildings on Broadway, expressed a keen delight at seeing the Chinese flag flying over the City Hall, and was interested throughout. On reaching the hotel, he mistook one of the brass-buttoned and liveried bell-boys for a high officer, and shook hands with him, to the astonishment of the youth. His apartments were the finest in the hotel — known as the "State Suite" — and here with his attaches and servants, Earl Li made his headquarters during his stay in New York. There are with him his nephew and adopted son, Li King Shu; Dr. George Mark, his Chinese physician; Mr. E. B. Drew, one of his trusted advisers; Dr. Irwin, another physician; three secretaries, seven attaches, two copyists, nine guards, a cook, and eleven other servants.

On the forenoon following the day of his arrival, Li Hung Chang was formally received by President Cleveland at the residence of Hon. Wm. C. Whitney, at Fifty-seventh street and Fifth avenue, New York, the White House and Capitol in Washington being at the present time in the hands of workmen. Mr. Whitney's home, however, is a palatial one, and well adapted for such an occasion. Li proceeded thither from the Waldorf, escorted by an troop of United States cavalry, the Earl, again in his famous yellow jacket and wearing his peacock feather, occupying a carriage with Mr. Olney, Secretary of State.

The President had arrived early in China and its ruler and regretting that the Viceroy's stay would not be of sufficient duration to permit him to form an adequate idea of our social and political life and progress. After a brief response by Li Hung Chang, also in a complimentary vein, he was introduced to the members of the Cabinet. He chatted freely for about a quarter of an hour, and then withdrew.

But this notable event was only the beginning of the long train of official and social honors that had been arranged. Banquets by the merchants, visits to notable places in the city and suburbs and various receptions were on the programme. He visited Gen. Grant's tomb at Riverside Park and laid a wreath on the grave of his old friend. Afterward he called upon Mrs. Grant and passed a pleasant hour with her and her family. At his hotel a multitude of callers visited him but he saw only a few. In conversation, he skillfully avoids all topics that might involve any expression concerning China's foreign policy. To the Missionary Boards who visited him he said that China feels the warmest friendship for all who come there from Europe and America and he wishes us to send more to establish schools, fight the opium evil and inculcate moral principles.

Li Hung Chang has had a remarkable career. The son of a member of the literati, he has risen, step by step, by virtue of his natural abilities and the faculty of making the most of all his educational and other opportunities, to be the foremost figure in the Chinese Empire next to the occupant of the throne. His titles are Ambassador of China, Senior Guardian of the Heir Apparent, Prime Minister of State, Earl of the First Rank, Su-Y, and Viceroy of China. He was born in 1822, and received a superior education, being an adept in classical studies, and while still a very young man giving promise of a fine future in either military or official life. His first opportunity for distinction came when the great Taiping rebellion was at its height.

From the Taiping war down to the present time Li Hung Chang has been identified, with steadily increasing prominence, with almost every event of military or civil importance in the Chinese Empire. He became not only the military commander of the imperial forces in the field, but the first counselor in the Empire and won a reputation as a statesman and diplomat equal to that he had already attained as a soldier. He was foremost in all that related to China's advancement and was a leader among those who desired that she be emancipated from the yoke of ancient custom and superstition. When Gen. Grant visited China, the two became warm friends, and even yet the aged Viceroy speaks feelingly of the great American soldier. But Li, though a soldier also, knows the value of peace. With Count Ito, the leading statesman of Japan, he attempted the adjustment of the difficulties between that country and China over Korea, and had not his object been thwarted, the war would have been averted. When China was exhausted, and sought peace Li, who had been temporarily in disgrace, was again sought by the Emperor as the only man to be trusted with the nation's interests in such an emergency. Once more he and Ito took up the task of reconciliation, a task which Earl Li performed so greatly to the satisfaction of his royal master and the nation that all his honors were restored.

It was after this stupendous task that Li, finding for the first time in his busy life a period of leisure, decided to make a tour of the world. Unquestionably his tour has an ulterior purpose beyond mere pleasuring and sight-seeing. China's commercial and naval growth, her valuable export trade, and her desire for wider and more profitable relations with civilized countries, — these and possibly other questions now considered of the first magnitude at Peking, have no doubt been entrusted to his sagacious diplomacy. He is intensely earnest in the desire for his country's progress, and his natural shrewdness will enable him to discover where her best interests lie, and who are most likely to aid or impede her advancement. His visit here at this time will encourage Americans in all their relations with his people, and may be productive of great results. His assurances of China's welcoming attitude toward the messengers of the Gospel cannot fail to awaken joy in the hearts of all who have worked and prayed for the extension of Divine truth in the Flowery Kingdom.

advised both by Russia and France not to come to America, but to return to China by other routes. Some lighter talk followed, during which Li Hung Chang displayed a keen sense of humor, and he seemed to be thoroughly enjoying himself, when it was politely intimated that he might wish to go upon deck. This, however, he was not disposed to do, and he sat comfortably in his easy bamboo chair while the naval squadron and a countless fleet of other vessels awaited his advent above. It would have been a proud moment for the American sea-dogs had Li ascended to look upon the glories of the assembled fleet: the Amphitrite, Columbia, Cincinnati, Indiana, Raleigh, Newark, Massachusetts, Maine, Texas, and New York, brave with their flags and with cannon pointed for the salute. While Earl Li lingered below, the St. Louis swept past the fleet, and Admiral Bunce's flagship, the New York, alone fired its guns. The land forts, too, thundered forth a welcome, and this was supplemented by a fusillade of fireworks from some Chinamen on various steamers.

Fully 5000 persons, including a number of Chinese residents, welcomed the great the morning and when the reception ceremonies began in the great drawing-room of the Whitney mansion, the Chief Executive stood surrounded by members of his Cabinet, the heads of the Army and Navy and members of the Diplomatic Corps, the whole gathering being a most distinguished and brilliant one. When the Chinese Viceroy was ushered into the room, accompanied by his adopted son and the Chinese Ambassador, he made a deep and formal bow to the President who acknowledged it in a similar manner. Earl Li then delivered his address in Chinese, speaking in a low, gentle voice and with the utmost respect in every gesture. In his address he stated that he had been specially appointed to convey a letter which expresses the desire of China's Emperor and people for the most cordial relations with America and the promotion of friendly intercourse between the two nations. He trusted that our government would continue to afford protection and kind treatment to Chinese immigrants and to render friendly assistance to the Chinese government when required. This being translated, the President replied briefly, highly complimenting Earl Li, expressing friendship for Destructive Vices.

Sunday School Lesson for Sept. 20. Prov. 16: 22-33. Golden Text, Prov. 16: 25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE first impression of the writer has been that, either the subject "Destructive Vices" or the passage, Prov. 16: 22-33, is a mistake; but as "all things work together for good to them that love God," she takes this as among the "all things," and trusts her God to use her in opening up the passage indicated.

Our golden text is a repetition of Prov. 14: 12. Every repetition in the Word of God is significant, and this is very much so. "There is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death." Seemeth right! He is indeed a fool who does not whether he is on the right or on the wrong way; "the wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way," (Prov. 14: 8). How earnest men are, when they are taking a journey, to make sure whether they are on the right train or the right steamer! Only a madman would take a train or steamship, without any idea of where it goes to.

When, by some mistake, a man gets into a wrong train or a wrong vessel, how he sets himself to discover by what means he may get right, and remedy his mistake! Time, money, engagements, may depend upon it.

How utterly foolish it would be for a man to take his seat in a train, and, without making any inquiry, to say, "Well, it seems the right train, a good many are going this way; if I am wrong, they are"—without taking the trouble to make sure! It is the man's wisdom to understand his way, and to take pains to understand, for there is a way "the end thereof are the ways of death." None of us are standing still, every day and hour of our lives finds us going forward; every night finds us farther on in the direction we are taking: the way of life or the way of death. Christ is the Living Way. (Heb. 10: 20; John 14: 6). Except we are in him, saved from sin by his precious blood, knowing by faith that our sins are pardoned, and by faith, walking in him, we are still on the way which leads to death, the way in which every man was born into this world. This "understanding is a well spring of life unto him that hath it." How then can true understanding be obtained? The Psalmist answers: "The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple." "Through thy precepts I get understanding." And he could testify moreover: "I have more understanding than all my teachers; for thy testimonies are my meditation." "I understand more than the ancients, because I keep thy precepts." God's Word, but God's Word meditated upon and kept, gives understanding for our way. And God's Word neglected, or read without meditation and without obedience, may leave us in that path of danger, "the end whereof are the ways of death."

There is very much in our subject for to-day which touches on Talking.

"The heart of the wise teacheth his mouth, and addeth learning to his lips." What does it teach the mouth? The next verse tells us, for it speaks of "pleasant words," which "are as a honeycomb, sweet to the soul and health to the bones." There are some of God's wisehearted ones of whom no man but a hypocrite is afraid. They come from above, of speaking words which are "sweet to the soul and health to the bones." They have a way of saying the right thing, because they are constantly waiting upon the Lord for their words. Comfort, counsel, encouragement, seem to flow out from them. They are wise in heart, wise enough not to speak from themselves, but from him who dwells within them. And there is health in their utterances. Keeping up as they do in continuous communion with God while they speak to man; he gives them the clue to the situation, they can speak home truths just at the right moment, and instead of wondering, just because it is a word in season, it brings health with it, and the one who is helped by it will say, "O, you have done me a world of good, it was just what I wanted." And the one who has spoken knows that the help came from a higher source, and says so. What a contrast is he who is described as the forward man and

The Whisperer!

"A worthless or ungodly man diggeth up evil," he cannot let it lie. If a scandal which has once filled a neighborhood with its evil odor has become forgotten for a time, a man whose own heart is a hotbed of sin, will dig it up from oblivion, and maliciously spread it abroad. Such is the froward man and the whisperer! While health is on the lips of the wise of heart, in the lips of the ungodly there is as "a burning fire," "it setteth on fire the course of nature, and is set on fire of hell." (James 3: 6.) It carries destruction in its breath. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." (Matt. 12: 34.) If the heart is full of bitterness, bitter words will certainly proceed from the mouth. "A froward man soweth strife, and a whisperer," a man or woman who is continually telling to one what others are not to hear, "separateth chief friends;" he is a disturber of the peace.

If this is so with the unconverted, O, how needful for the children of God to take warning! Every tree brings forth fruit after its kind. (Gen. 1: 11); if a Christian mistress, in giving orders to her servant, does it in a tone of voice, or with a turn of expression, which disparages the poor girl, and makes her to despair because all her efforts to please are in vain, it is evident that the lips of the mistress do not give forth the "pleasant words" which are health to the soul. Is there not then something unhealthy in the heart of the mistress? If a truth which needs to be spoken is spoken in the most disagreeable way by a Christian master to a workman, and wounds him, not because it is not true, but because it is spoken unkindly, is it not an evidence that there is something unhealthy in the heart of that master?

Words which sow strife instead of unity, which separate chief friends, which wound unnecessarily, and do not leave behind a savor of Christ, bear their own witness against the heart from which they came. "The violent man enticeth his neighbor, and leadeth him into a way that is not good: he shutteth his eyes to devise froward things, moving his lips (or, he that compresseth his lips), he bringeth evil to pass." And equally strong are the words: "A fool's lips utter into contention, and his mouth calleth for strokes." "A fool's mouth is his destruction, and his lips are the snare of his soul. The words of a tale-bearer (or whisperer) are as wounds, they go down into the innermost parts of the belly." (Prov. 23: 6-8). How necessary for God's sake, for the sake of others, and for our own sakes, that we should have

A Tongue Under Control!

And as no man can tame the tongue (James 3: 8), how needful that heart and tongue, too, should be under the immediate and constant control of the Lord himself! The words of the Lord Jesus were Spirit and Life, and he meant that ours, conveying his messages, should be the same; but the tongue of man, if giving out only that which is in his natural heart, "is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison" (James 3: 8). If the tongue, under the discipline of the Holy Ghost, expresses only Christ in us, our words will be health and life to all. And this is possible. Jesus Christ who died for us, lives in us to the end, and, at the same time, he ever liveth at God's right hand to make intercession for us, that in heart, in word, in life, we may be conformed to his image, as he for us, and in us, prevails in the hour of temptation.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

"THE WAYS OF DEATH."

THE twelve proverbs which the International Committee has selected as the subject of the lesson on Temperance, form part of the treasury of Oriental wisdom which in our Bibles extends from the beginning of the book to the sixteenth verse of the twenty-second chapter. This section of the book, more clearly than the other parts, appears to have had Solomon as its author. Other sections are said to have been "the words of the wise" (Prov. 22: 17), and were probably a collection of aphorisms current in Jewish society of a later date. The first nine chapters of the book, whether by Solomon or some other writer have a different character and a higher tone. These twelve, like the remainder of the section, are doubtless some of the three thousand proverbs that the wise king is reported to have uttered. They are brief, pointed sayings consisting of a single antithetical sentiment, showing the consequences of good and evil conduct. For the greater part they are, as in this group of twelve, without order or connection, each standing by itself like a nugget of spiritual gold. They are entitled to our reverent attention as the utterances of a man endowed above all others of his time with wisdom and renowned in all history. That he fell and fell grievously, does not detract from their value. His fall indeed gives emphasis and authority to his warnings, as those of a man who knew what he was talking about and had proved by sad experience the bitterness of sin and the misery that comes from forsaking the way of the Lord. The picture he draws in this group of the wicked man (or as the Revised Version has it, the "worthless man") is remarkably vivid. He cannot be taught, but must learn wisdom by the consequences of his own misdeeds, instructed by his own folly. He labors to produce evil, digging as it were, to find more of it than is on the surface, and his lips are like a scorching fire, injuring all who come within sound of his voice. He delights in setting other people to quarrelling, and his whispers sever friendship. He is so intent on evil that he shuts his eyes, that he may give all his attention to his wicked designs; or the reference is to the leer and the wink of the sly plotter. And he is not content with going to ruin himself, but entices his neighbors to wicked ways. That is Solomon's portrait of the worthless man, and after nearly three thousand years, its accuracy is still abundantly proven. Sin has not changed its effects on the human soul. It finds new opportunities and new methods, but it produces the same results that it produced in Judea thirty centuries ago. Of the other proverb in the group, not concerned with the ed man, one refers to the words of the wise, which are declared to be not froth and sound, but taught from the essence or of the heart. A second is a warning to people who claim that honest intention absolves a man from guilt, though he has neglected the information accessible to him. "There is a way at seemeth right unto a man; but the end thereof are the ways of death." A third shows the emptiness of a life of mere sensual indulgence. It is a monotonous circle; the man labors for food that he may have strength to do more labor. His appetite consumes all he produces, and if he has no higher life, he is a slave. A fourth aphorism is more suited to mental lands, where they have respect for age, than for our land and time. Solomon delicately suggests that old age has no claim on veneration, unless it is right old age. Another maxim gives the king's conception of true greatness. He has more respect for the man who has control of his own temper than he has for a man of great prowess or mighty achievements. He who can rule his own self so that he is not at the mercy of his anger or vexation, or vindictiveness, is in Solomon's opinion a greater man than he who conquers a city. Finally, the idea of chance is an absurdity, God over-rules things. Even the casting of lots, which is resorted to because it apparently seems the element of chance, is under divine control. The disposal of it is of the Lord.

The whole disposing of it is of the Lord. People often talk of things as being chance which are the result of natural law, and they often speak of natural as if it were not the work of God. A Christian philosopher was much annoyed by an infidel telling his child that the world came into existence by development and was not created by God. He did not attempt to convince the child at the time, but took a practical means of doing so later. He went into his garden and made furrows in the soft earth in the shape of the child's initials. These he sowed with garden cresses, smoothed the earth over, and went away. A few days later the child came in glee to the father, begging him to come and see how his name had grown in the garden. "A curious coincidence," said the father, looking at it. "No," said the child, "some one must have done it on purpose. They would not grow that way by chance." "Do you really think so?" the father asked. "I do not see any greater difficulty in thinking that they grew that way by chance than in thinking that this world with its marvellous adaptation of means to ends came by chance." The child saw the analogy and was convinced.

The hoary head is a crown of glory. "I am whitening fast," said a candid friend to Dr. Rees in his old age. "That is so," replied the famous preacher. "Have you ever noticed the white flowers that are the first to come out in the spring? Sometimes they do not wait until all the snow is gone; but we are all glad to see snowdrop because it tells us that winter is over and the summer is near at hand. My white hairs are like the snowdrops, only a reminder to me that my winter life will soon be over and my eternal summer is near."

There is a way that seemeth right. Temptation never comes with so much force when it puts on the garb of right and justice. Paul deplored the persecution he had waged, but he declared that he did not believe that he was doing God service. Many persecutors since his day have held the same belief. The conscience needs to be educated; otherwise it may lead us into wrongdoing. A Neapolitan shepherd was in great distress to a priest and begged with tears for absolution. In a moment of abstraction he had eaten a morsel of meat during Lent and his conscience tormented him. "Have you no other sins to confess?" the priest asked. "None," answered the shepherd. The priest persisted. He said, "there have been many robberies and murders in the mountains this year and I have my suspicions that you were one of the men concerned in them." The shepherd admitted the fact without any hesitation, "but," he said, "we do not account such things, crimes. We all do when we have an opportunity and I do not know there was need to confess it. Yet, the same man was in terror, because he had eaten meat in Lent."

JUST A WEE, HUNCH-BACKED GIRL,

Better Life was Brightened at Our Children's Home — Maggie, A Typical Child of the Tenements.

AMONG the grimy roomies of Hamilton St.,—those that have escaped the demolition that has overtaken so many such places recently—there are few that can compare in age and dilapidation with one rickety building in which a number of poor families live. They exist there in apparent defiance of the laws of health, for the air is foul, the trench often sickening and the sunlight a stranger to most of the rooms, few of which are bigger than a good-sized hen-coop. In one of these apartments, cleaner and drier than the rest, lives an old washerman, with her grandchild, a pale little lump-back, whose spinal affection has dwarfed her growth. Maggie C—is twelve but she looks like a child of six or seven, although her wee, pinched face is almost like that of a woman. She has great, sparkling eyes and a sensitive mouth, and her face, when she looks up at you, or when she speaks in her weak, childish tone, seems to quiver with timidity. When Maggie was only two years old, her father deserted the home, leaving her mother to grapple with a group of little ones to carry on the fight for existence single-handed. It ended in many a similar struggle has done, in the poor mother's death from overwork after two more years had passed. Then this little home was broken up, the children scattered and Maggie—poor, little hunch-backed creature that she was—was taken in by the old grandmother.

It was a hard life that the old woman and the child led in that gloomy tenement. No holiday, never a pleasure; indeed the two were lucky to get bread, let alone luxuries. Times were hard, and work slack; but the rent had to be paid and the must live somehow. So the grandmother bravely kept up the fight, although many a time she heaved a bitter sigh as she went to the bare cupboard and thought of herself, but of the little one—her own daughter's child—hungry and ill. If but one of those years of constant struggle could be written, they would be a history of interest and instruction for those who rarely give a thought to "God's poor," thousands of whom are fighting just such a battle as this noble old grandmother has been doing. She did the cooking for three families—plain enough, for all alike were poor—she washed, she scrubbed, she toiled and moiled, and the salt was just enough to keep the wolf of want away and hold the shelter over their heads. And so long as she could manage to do this, she and her little deformed grandchild were not unhappy.

But a red-letter day came into Maggie's life. Miss Delaney, one of the good Christian missionaries who are constantly looking for the neediest and poorest children to go to Mont-Lawn, heard of the little hunch-back. She arranged with the grandmother to send Maggie to our Children's Home for a time, and as good fortune would have it, Maggie's name on the list of our wee guests stood directly opposite the register number 5000. She was the five thousandth child received since the first day the Home opened, two summers ago. On the day of her coming the news had preceded her, and our boys and girls solved to give the little stranger a right royal welcome. A dozen wee maids went off to the woods around Mont-Lawn and there they gathered a bunch of golden-rod, with which they decorated a chair that was set apart for the little hunch-back girl. A chorus of merry, childish voices greeted her as she drove up in the Home wagonette, and the air was full of waving flags and handkerchiefs. Little Maggie looked bewildered, and her big eyes opened wider in surprise as the children crowded around her and bore her off to the great dining tent, where they set her down in a bower of wild flowers, to a table that was spread with what, to her simple mind, seemed a queenly feast. And for the first time in her life, the poor, afflicted child of the tenements found herself the centre of interest and everybody showering kindness and love upon her. Not a word escaped her lips, but her deep-set eyes shone with pleasure and her thin, white face flushed with happiness. It was indeed a new experience—a chapter from fairy-land—and she pinched herself to see whether she was awake or dreaming. Yes, it was all true; the flowers, the voices, the girls, and the nice, hot, appetizing dinner after the beautiful drive, all were realities. Yet it was so strange! And in the evening, when she was placed gently in the floral chair with the golden-rod nodding like a sceptre above her head and all around her, and carried to the chapel, she felt that she knew what it was to be a queen—a real, live, true, little queen—if only for a day. The children sang, and it seemed as if all their music was for her; and they spoke and recited and laughed and chattered, and she felt that she had somehow been lifted out of the dull, sad, tenement life, and dropped right down plumb into the mysterious "Land of Happiness," hidden somewhere among the clouds. Could it be true that these were tenement children like herself? Their voices still sounded sweetly in her ears through the mingled prayers that were said in the dormitories, and when her head was at last snugly pillowed, and the snowy coverlet tucked up about her by a kind care-taker, she fell asleep to dream of rambles among the flowers and still happier times on the morrow.

Ten days in the Home made a wonderful change in Maggie, and gave her a start toward health and happiness. Her case is not an exceptional one. During the present season, Mont-Lawn has fed and sheltered hundreds of children just as poor and wretched as she, not a few of them invalids, and some whose homes and surroundings are such as to excite the deepest commiseration. It is to brighten the lives and cheer the hearts of these neglected children, that our Fresh-Air work at Mont-Lawn is carried on. There are thousands of children situated like Maggie, suffering through no fault of their own, who might be made happy for a whole year by such a holiday, and we are grateful to have the co-operation of our readers in the work. Three dollars pays all expenses for a ten days' vacation for a boy or girl at our Children's Home. While we write, there are hundreds of tattered and barefooted petitioners for an outing—far more than the limited resources of the Home will allow. We invite all who love and sympathize with the children to aid us in making the season at Mont-Lawn a glorious success for the little folks, so that really no needy child may be denied the coveted boon.

Many visitors, some of them quite distinguished, come to Mont-Lawn, and all are greatly interested in our children. Recently Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, the well-known author and editor, and a favorite contributor to this journal, delighted both the children and the care-takers with her presence for half a day. Her sweet ways and the deep interest she took in each little waif, won all hearts. Mrs. Amelia Barr, the greatest of living women authors, also visited the Home, and her gracious words and the charming way in which she spoke to our missionaries, were greatly appreciated. An Oriental, Mrs. Esther Kim Pak, of Seoul, Korea, the first woman to leave her native country for study, was another visitor. She was accompanied by her little daughter, the first and only Korean baby ever born in America. Mrs. Pak hopes to return a fully equipped medical missionary to her own country.

Mrs. Sangster, after her visit to the Home, wrote the following beautiful poem, which we take pleasure in laying before our readers:

Gather the Little Ones In.

Do you know any little barefoot boy
In a garret or a cellar,
Who shivers with cold, and whose garments
Will scarcely hold together?

REFRAIN:

Go, bring him in! There is room to spare,
Here are food and shelter and pity;
And we'll not shut the door on one of Christ's poor,
Though you bring every child in the city.
Do you know any little bright-eyed girl,
Who likes to help her mother,
Who can stand by a tub and rub and scrub,
And care for her baby brother?
Do you know any children out at work,
In places dark and dreary—
Children who cry to the great wide sky
For help when they are weary?

"LITTLE No. 5,000," AT OUR CHILDREN'S HOME.

Do you know who said we must gather in,
His lambs, where'er we find them
It was Christ our Lord, we obey his Word,
And he bids us feed and mind them.

New Hebrides' Superstitions.

Rev. J. W. Landels, of the New Hebrides Mission, writes of the superstitions of the natives among whom he has been laboring for several years: "They spend their life in an atmosphere of superstition. Nothing comes to pass by chance or natural causes. Some personality is responsible for all that happens. A rainbow is seen in the sky, and they at once say that the spirits of the departed chiefs are come to call one or more of the number of chiefs on earth to dwell with them in Ndoria, somewhere away in the clouds. A meteor flashes across the sky, and some catastrophe is about to happen. A chief, whose head is touched by the hand of anyone, is sure to die because of it. The system of caste, so prevalent amongst the people, is steeped in superstition. No woman can eat the same food eaten by her husband, neither dare she cook at the same fire, or use the same match or the same piece of firewood. No one grade of chieftainship—of which there are no less than ten—can eat the food belonging to that of the other. These and numerous other restrictions are the result of fears that the spirits or the sacred men will cause some sickness to visit them, by which they shall die and forever forfeit their place in Ndoria.

"In consequence of the superstitious belief that many evil spirits are always abroad at night, no native ever goes out of his hut without having in his hand a fire-stick or a torch, with which to keep away those spirits who do not love the light. Their superstition militates against them when sick, and it takes a long time before they can be induced to have confidence in the white man's medicine or submit to his treatment. In the last great epidemic which passed over the island, and to which many succumbed, of all those who submitted to our treatment, not one died, but they were only a minority of the affected ones. Then they are very cruel in their heathen state, cruel to the aged, whom they often cast out when unfit to work for their own food, and to the sick, who are often buried alive, because their friends cannot be troubled attending to them."

A Martyr and His Mother.

During the massacre of Christians at Marash, in Armenia, several months ago, a young man was given the option of death or a change of faith, and was instantly beheaded. When his headless body was taken to his mother to terrify and convert her, she, instead of being in the least frightened or affected by the sight, kissed the dead son's hand and said: "Rather so, my son, than living to deny our Lord and Saviour." Blessed mother of a brave son!

A Christian Hindu Lecturer.

Mr. S. C. K. Rutnam, the brilliant young Hindu Christian lecturer, who has been lecturing with much acceptance on India, has just started on a lecturing tour to Canada. His eloquent utterances at the recent great Christian Endeavor Convention at Washington and at Ocean Grove Auditorium will long be remembered. Letters may be addressed to him to the care of the Y. M. C. A., Toronto, until September 15, when he returns to the United States.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

James L. Smith, Minneapolis, Minn. I have but recently received the CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I am thoroughly interested. I want an Encyclopedia badly, especially if I can earn it by working for it. Will you kindly state in your next issue what the conditions are under which a new subscriber can receive the World Wide Encyclopedia as a gift? Is it up to date, and is it an Encyclopedia or a Year-Book? I thought an Encyclopedia about a year ago, and when I opened it, I found that it was a Year-Book, and I would not like to make the same mistake again.

Any one who sends ten subscribers for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the regular subscription price, $1.50 each, will receive a set of The World-Wide Encyclopedia free. We do not pay freight charges, however. It makes no difference whether you are an old subscriber or a new subscriber. As the offer will positively be withdrawn this month, you should send us $5, on receipt of which we will immediately ship the Encyclopedia. Then apply yourself to getting the ten subscriptions. Send the subscriptions in as fast as you receive them, retaining a half dollar from each one. When you have secured the ten subscribers you will have refunded to yourself the $5 which you advanced to make sure of The World-Wide Encyclopedia. The sooner you get the subscriptions, the sooner you get your $5 back. We will allow you all the time required to make good the ten subscribers. Take your own time about it, and do the best you can.

All that is necessary under these circumstances is to write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about as follows: "Enclosed, please find $5 for which send me a complete set of The World-Wide Encyclopedia. Ship via (here state the route), to (here state the station). If the books are satisfactory, I will send you ten subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as soon as I am able to secure them, and I will send them separately as fast as I get them, retaining fifty cents from each subscriber."

"If I am not pleased with the books, after inspecting them, I reserve the right to return them within ten days after they reach my hands, in which case you will refund the $5 herewith enclosed." Sign your name and enclose the money either by money order, draft, or if you send in cash, register your letter.

In reply to your request for a description of The World-Wide Encyclopedia, we repeat from our issue of August 5: The World-Wide Encyclopedia answers every question, however difficult or abstruse. A digest of all knowledge from the earliest times is contained within its pages, and no person, however untutored, provided he can read, need lack for full information on any subject within the scope of human knowledge, when once he is the possessor of this work of universal interest. The World-Wide Encyclopedia is an epitome of the "sum total of wisdom and knowledge." It treats fully and exhaustively of every subject of human interest, whether history, science, literature, art, or the like. It includes, in its pages, the history of the world, from the beginning of things down to the practical questions of our own day. It is a fountain of knowledge on all subjects, and contains more compact wisdom than was ever stored in the brain of the greatest sage on earth.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia contains 15 large volumes, and these are handsomely and durably bound in rich silk-finish lined cloth, and stamped in solid gold. Each volume is 9 inches high, and the set will make a striking array nearly two feet in length. The set weighs about 40 pounds, and is so arranged that it can be carried in a prior of this journal, in order to make every man, woman and child who desires a complete knowledge of the world, and of the things that are going on in it, without any financial sacrifice, purchased for a very small sum. The set weighs nearly 200,000 pounds, and so great has been the demand for this wonderful work that within the first two weeks nearly 20 tons were shipped to the subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who availed themselves of this exceptional opportunity. The offer will positively be withdrawn late this month, and this is the final call to all who intend to secure this great work.

If you cannot send $5, send what you can, but not less than $1, and we will reserve one set for you until you have earned it. In several instances, persons who earned a set of the Encyclopedia by sending ten subscribers at $1.50 each, afterwards sold their set for $20 or more, and then started in to earn a second set. We have nearly 1,000 letters on file from people all over the country, who are congratulating themselves on their exceeding good fortune in having secured a set of The World-Wide Encyclopedia, and we hope to number you among them.

J. W. W., Riverside, Cal. Where are the Israelites?

It is not known. Many students of prophecy believe that the Anglo-Saxon race is dean invalid Christian lady, settled among them and began a mission work, two years ago. It is a very poor and needy mission, yet it has been the means of gathering in many souls and has purified the morals of the whole island.

Rosa B. Moore, Indian Falls, N. Y. 1. Please state the price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Library, with the paper for one year. 2. I long for the World-Wide Encyclopedia, for I know its value. If you will be so kind as to hold one about two months, I think I could get the ten subscribers, or I would send half of them as soon as it is possible.

1. The paper with the Library Premium, is $3. 2. See our general explanation to all inquirers regarding the Encyclopedia, on the first column of this page.

Miss Emma Nason, a missionary among the lumbermen and miners, writes:

Many thanks for the money from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for our Mission. When your favor came, I was absent on the Great Iron Range, where nearly all the large mines are closing down again. On returning, I found one of our twin waifs at the point of death, and we have just buried him. These beautiful twins were born in our home at Sault Ste. Marie on Washington's birthday, and we adopted them.

Subscriber, Yiskilwa, Ill. I can't see how a man or woman, either, can be an habitual drinker and at the same time be a Christian. About how much influence for good would such a person have? There are too many people who think they may use strong drink and pass as Christians. The two don't go together, if I read the Bible correctly.

Christianity and drunkenness (the latter even in a modified sense), are wholly incom-

Germany, and France, but throughout Europe and in a large portion of Asia, Africa, America, the Arctic, the whole of Australia and the islands of the Pacific.

M. B. Z., Janesville, O. I am somewhat thankful you for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Library Helps. I received them all right, without a fault, and I enjoy them very much. I have shown them to quite a few of my friends and they think very nice. I may in time receive some subscribers for you.

Albert Clemens, Washington, Ont. Is the Pope of Alexandria still standing at the present and if so, in what condition?

No; it was still in existence in the thirteenth century, but has long since crumbled into ruin.

J. T., Cincinnati, O. Has Tibet yet opened its eyes to the Gospel and allowed the missionaries to come in?

Not officially; Misses Annie Taylor and Belle Ferguson, are now at Yantung, in Tibet, where they have hopes of being able to open mission station. Some very effective missionary work is being done on the Chino-Tibet frontier.

Reader, Chicago, Ill. Does not Timothy mean that woman's sin was greater than man's, and that her punishment will be greater?

We do not so understand the passage. People will be punished for the sins they actually commit unless they are pardoned through Christ. They will not be punished for the sins committed by Adam and Eve. The Bible where represents them as being held responsible for that. The Calvinistic doctrine will take more account than any other of the sin of man does not claim more than that he suffered the loss of sonship by Fall with all that it involves, as the heirs of a once wealthy man suffer poverty if he dissipates the fortune that would have come to them from him. God is not unjust. Paul draws rather fine distinction between the responsibility of the two. He seems to imply that woman yielding to temptation showed her weakness, while Adam yielding to Eve's suggestion showed his love for her.

S. S. Teacher, Philadelphia, Pa. Is there any reliable system of biblical chronology? Are all our calculations wrong in giving the date of creation as 4,004 years before Christ?

The dates in the margins of the Bibles are no part of the Bible itself, any more than are the summaries of contents at the head of the chapters. The date 4,004 is undoubtedly wrong. Prof. Heilprecht, who is excavating the ruins of ancient Babylon, has found records dating back over seven thousand years before Christ.

J. B. V., Magda, Kans. 1. What is the house referred to in Hebrews 12:22? 2. Can eternal life be lost if it is obtained?

1. The meaning is not clear. It is generally understood as referring to Christ's indwelling. The expressions Paul uses in several of his epistles, such as "Christ in you" (Col. 1:27) implies a conception of Christ dwelling in a man as in a house, giving him strength and confidence. The question of final perseverance has been debated in times since the Apostolic age. On the one hand the injunctions to vigilance would imply the possibility of lapse, and on the other there is the assurance that he who believed shall never perish. We cherish the hope that none who are once united to Christ by a living faith will ever be finally lost.

AN ANCIENT EASTERN CHURCH, NOW DESECRATED.

During the recent troubles in the Mohammedan Empire, hundreds of native Christian churches—many of them several centuries old—were desecrated by the Kurds and Turks, and after being pillaged and their sacred vessels stolen have been converted into mosques. In the photograph above is shown the famous Greek Church of the Holy Apostles, which was the principal Patriarchal Church, and remained so for one hundred and thirty-five years. It is on a beautiful site, overlooking the Valley of Phalaris in the Zelah Sokak. It was founded in the twelfth century by Michael Ducas and his wife Maria, sister of the famous emperor Alexius Comnenus. The church was turned into a mosque by Sultan Murad III., and the tombs of Emperor Alexius Comnenus, the celebrated Anna Comnenus, and Emperor John Paleologus, nearby were destroyed.

scended from the lost ten tribes; but the theory has not been generally accepted. Others believe that in some unexplored land they will yet be found and restored to their own land at the time that the Jews are restored before the beginning of the millennium. Prophecy certainly indicates such a restoration but as yet no way of fulfillment is conceivable.

OF THE GOSPEL. How long ago was the Gospel first preached to the Gentiles? How long ago was the first Christian church established? How long ago was the first Christian church established? How long ago was the first Christian church established?

It is estimated by Norton and other leading investigators that over 60,000 copies of the Gospels were in circulation among Christians before the end of the second century of our era. Origen employed a large staff of skilled writers to copy the books, and Eusebius made this a part of the entire Bible for the Emperor Constantine. Thousands of copies were written out for private use. This was a slow and expensive process, but it was the only one then available.

OF THE GOSPEL. How long ago was the Gospel first preached to the Gentiles? How long ago was the first Christian church established? How long ago was the first Christian church established?

It is on an island in Mobile Bay, Ala., populated by a rough class of fishermen and oystermen, whose spiritual condition was sadly neglected until Mrs. O. E. Stombaugh, patible. A man cannot serve God and the devil simultaneously. It is our duty to preserve our material bodies as temples, pure and fit for the occupancy of immortals, and to respect those laws which the Almighty, through nature, has established, as essential to our material and spiritual well-being. In proportion as we violate those laws (and intemperance is a distinct infraction of them), we destroy our opportunities for Christian service and ruin our influence for good.

HANSEN, Mo. GENTLEMEN:—The World-Wide Encyclopedia arrived in good order, and to say that I am pleased does not half express it. I shall certainly make every effort to secure the number of subscribers required to give me the ownership of the set.

Susan Whitaker, Trenton, N. J. Is not the Koran more widely read than any other so-called sacred or religious book?

Excepting the Bible, yes. It is read in the Turkish Empire, both in Europe and Asia, in Arabia, part of North Africa, and also certain parts of India and of other Asiatic countries. But the Bible is not only read by the four leading nations of the world: America, Britain,

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Angelo.

MY hero is a small Italian boy, with melting eyes of coal-black, a nut-brown skin, and heaps of raven hair, tumbled in picturesque disorder about his beautiful face. Such a face may a Roman boy wear in the days of Augustus, of such a king's son might be thankful. But Angelo is very poor, and is glad to earn a scanty living by selling newspapers near the City Hall in our own big New York, and by any odd jobs he can get. Small as he is and young, not yet at his tenth birthday, Angelo is the stay of his family, and his mother depends on him, she often says, next to God. When I look at Angelo's face, especially when she has the baby in her arms, I am reminded of the stately sweet women, dark-eyed, dark-haired, and pale-faced whom the old masters immortal on their canvasses, and she said to me, if I were a painter, as my mother the Madonna. But she is only a poor, very ignorant, and very loving woman. Still, I count her among my friends, and I love her, and her boy, was hurrying down-town one chilly morning wondering whether the tulips and crocuses would soon begin to show, and fancying the bare brown stems of the trees rustling with green leaves before, when my steps were arrested by a pitiful sight. There was Angelo, sleeping. He was sitting beside Sammy the blacking-stand, his head drooping over the leg of the chair on which people sit to have their boots "shined," his face relaxed and pathetic, for at ten in the morning an active little fellow does not naturally sleep. I stood still and watched the worn, pallid countenance, and a flood of sympathy swept over my heart, and I could read there that Angelo was not only tired, but hungry and distressed. He was crying before he fell asleep, and his face had made furrows on the not over-though delicate and softly moulded face. He does not like to see a child's face complete a revelation of utter weariness. When Angelo is awake, he is so alert and so alive in look and gesture, that I can associate poverty and suffering with the bright a personality; but asleep, at twelve o'clock in the morning, with throngs of people, and street cars clanging, and the wind thundering overhead, and the sea booming down, asleep, little Angelo's countenance betrayed secrets.

I led to Sammy Tate, "What ails Angelo? Is he ill, or starving?" "His mother was turned out of doors last night, I hear," answered Sammy. "He couldn't pay the rent, and Angelo is sleeping under the bridge, maybe; at any rate, he's all broke up now and I'm afraid he hasn't had his breakfast."

help was great. The poor are kind to one another, and very generous. One neighbor had taken in the twins, Giovanni and Pietro, another was sheltering Angelo and the baby, and the father of the brood, a good-humored, shiftless, easygoing man who could never get on, was looking for work along the wharf. He never had any regular work, and it seemed as if he never would have any, though he tried diligently enough. There are people born to ill-fortune, or no success, which is as fatal, one way as the other.

The moment my eyes fell on Marianna, I saw that she had been weeping. Brave-spirited woman that she is, she seldom cries, but the one terror of the very poor, the not being able to meet their room rent, had crushed her for the time. This dreadful bugbear of rent, a spectre in the path, is forever menacing and threatening people in her estate of penury and want.

While I was talking with Marianna and planning a little, so that the family might again have a roof over them, and their little furniture be saved, there was a great commotion in the street. Up drove a splendid carriage, with two richly-appointed horses, their coats sleek as satin, their harness silver-mounted, the coachman and and long golden curls, and last of all—Angelo.

"Of all things!" I exclaimed, and Marianna stood speechless, her hands clasped.

The old lady spoke first. "Are you this boy's mother? I saw him do a brave deed. He pushed an old man aside just as the poor blundering fellow was going to step in front of a cable car, and as I saw him from my carriage, and I like to reward presence of mind and courage, I stopped to ask who he was."

"And then," said the younger lady, "the boy fell down in a dead faint."

"He hadn't had any breakfast," chimed

THE OLD SLAVE-MARKET AT ZANZIBAR.

footman in livery on the box, and as the equipage drew up before the humble doorway where I was standing with Marianna, out stepped, the footman opening the door with a flourish, one of the prettiest old ladies I ever saw, a real fairy godmother in her sweet expression. She was dressed in gray silk and soft furs, and after in the wee girlie.

"Now," said the fairy godmother, "I'm going to look into this case. The boy is so pretty, my daughter is going to paint his picture. But first we must make you all more comfortable."

A little money, a heart full of good will, a measure of Christian consecration and love, how far they go. Mrs. Eller discovered that Angelo's mother knew how to make a very useful and really pretty kind of lace, and when the family, all debts paid, were established in a nice respectable tenement, Marianna was set up with a lace-maker's outfit, and patrons were found for her. For the husband a porter's place was secured, with a chance to rise, if rise he could. Angelo was sent to the Italian mission-school on Sundays, and daily, to school, though he still sold the evening papers.

The sum of it all is that the good God, of whom Marianna reverently speaks, never forgets his own. Also that there are always ready and loving hearts and hands in the world, and that the destitute will be assisted if only the right means can be taken to bring those who have and will bestow, and those who have not and want, together. And the connecting link is somewhere out of our sight in God's kind Providence.

Revolution in Zanzibar.

An Arab Usurper Seizes the Late Sultan's Palace, but is Driven Out by English Guns.

IN the Island of Zanzibar, off the east coast of Africa, which has, joined with it, a long, narrow strip of territory on the mainland, there has been a short-lived revolution. In the friendly arrangement that the European Powers made some time ago as to their "spheres of influence" in the Dark Continent, when Madagascar was surrendered to the French, Zanzibar fell to the English, who immediately established a protectorate there. There was at the time a dispute as to the succession to the throne, which was settled by the English espousing the cause of Seyyid Hamed bin Thwain, one of the claimants. Through their influence he was seated on the throne and proclaimed Sultan of Zanzibar. An income of $25,000 a year was assigned to him, which was especially welcome, as his sole source of income prior to his accession had been the proceeds of a plantation of cloves. The misery of his life had been his contests with the money lenders, to whom he was in the habit of mortgaging his harvest long before it was ripe. His gratitude to the English for the change in his fortunes was effusive, and was shown in his granting them all the concessions they asked. They became practically the rulers of the country, and have governed it with excellent results. The Arabs, however, have been discontented with the arrangement, which shut them out of the best places in the Sultan's service, and menaced their trade in slaves, which had been one of the chief sources of their prosperity in Zanzibar. In former times there had been an open slave market in the island, and even yet there are many slaves secretly sold there. The English proceed slowly in these matters, but the Arabs believed, not without reason, that when the open slave market was abolished and the trade had to be conducted in secret, it was nearing its extinction altogether.

On August 25 came the news that the Sultan of Zanzibar was dead. Not a few people suspected that his death was due to the disaffection of the Arabs, who longed for a Sultan less amenable to English influence. Following closely on this news came the report that the palace had been seized by Seyyid Khalid, who with nine hundred soldiers, trained by European officers, had taken possession and been proclaimed Sultan. He is a cousin of the late monarch, and a man in whom the Arabs had confidence. The English, however, preferred Hamoud bin Mohammed bin Seyyid another cousin of the deceased Sultan, and they notified Khalid that they regarded him as a usurper. Khalid, being in possession, declined to surrender, and as he had trained troops and a war-ship built in England to defend himself, he bade them defiance. The act was one of temerity. The British had three gunboats in the harbor from which the palace was bombarded. It was speedily destroyed, and the ruins were in flames. The Sultan's war-ship which pluckily opened fire on the British ships was also sunk. A force of marines was then sent ashore to take possession. After a short but stubborn fight they were successful, and the British protégé was proclaimed Sultan. The defeated claimant to the throne fled for protection to the German consulate. He was sheltered there, but it is expected that he will be given up in response to an English appeal to the Berlin government. It is hoped that now that the British have made their power felt in the country, they will use it for the entire suppression of the slave trade, which has hitherto found at Zanzibar the convenient market it needs for its barbarous commodity.

THE FOREIGN CONSULATES AT ZANZIBAR.

Having given Sammy some money to find my little friend, I proceeded in search of Marianna, knowing that her need of Household Piety.

FAMILY prayers are often of no use. Perhaps they are too hurried. We have so much before us of the daily work that we hustle the children together. We get half through the chapter before the family are seated. We read as if we were reading for a wager. We drop on our knees and are in the second or third sentence before they all get down. It is an express train, with Amen for the first depot. We rush for the hat and overcoat, and are on the way to the store, leaving the impression that family prayers are a necessary nuisance, and we had better not have had any gathering of the family at all. Better have given them a kiss all around; it would have taken less time and would have been more acceptable to God and them.

Family prayers often fail in adaptedness. Do not read for the morning lesson a genealogical chapter, or about Samson's setting the foxes' tails on fire, or the prophecy about the horses, black and red and speckled, unless you explain why they are speckled. For all the good your children get from such reading, you might as well have read a Chinese almanac. Rather give the story of Jesus, and the children climbing into his arms, or the lad with the loaves and fishes, or the Sea of Galilee dropping to sleep under Christ's lullaby. Stop and ask questions. Make the exercise so interesting that little Johnny will stop playing with his shoe-strings, and Jenny will quit rubbing the cat's fur the wrong way. Let the prayer be pointed and made up of small words, and no wise information to the Lord about things he knows without your telling him. Let the children feel they are prayed for. Have a hymn if any of you can sing. Let the season be spirited, appropriate and gladly solemn.

Gospel of Hand-Shaking.

HE who knows how to shake hands vigorously and well has a high commission from the throne of heaven to bless and save. Shake hands with him who is returning from evil ways and it will give new muscle to his resolution. Shake hands with the troubled and there will rise triumph over their suffering. Shake hands with the sick; it will be stimulating to him. Shake hands with the good in promise of eternal association. Shake hands with the young; it will start them on the right road; with the middle-aged, it will lighten their burdens; with the old, it will radiate the evening of their days. Let us come nearer together. Standing wide apart, Satan comes in between us with bickerings and jealousies and hate. Close up the ranks. God speed the day when all the world shall shake hands. Russia with Turkey, Germany with France, Eastern Hemisphere with Western Hemisphere, Earth with Heaven. That will be the year of the world's deliverance, and lion's mane and lamb's fleece shall interlock each other, and the infant stroke the snake's crest, and there be nothing to hurt or destroy in all God's holy mount.

Climatic Uncertainties.

WHILE the weather probabilities as announced to us are of great importance, we have, through them, constant proof of the impotence of humany prophecy. Because by study of the laws of weather, men come to a good guess concerning the conditions of the atmosphere two or three days ahead, we have now pretenders who propose to rifle Omnipotence of its secrets for two months approximate, and the valuable premising that advantages the shipping and puts the world on healthy guard, is discredited by the wild gamblers in weather. It will never be well for the world to know too long ahead what will happen. Part of the best discipline of life is the disappointment that comes from unexpected changes of climate. So our faith in God is cultured, and so we are made sympathetic with those who cannot escape exposure, however much they anticipate it, and so we are made willing at last to exchange a world of tempest for a world of calm, air without any chill, sky without any cloud, eternal spring-tide without any winter. I make earnest protest against the meteorological pretension which creates infidelity in regard to reasonable and well founded predictions. The only reliable prophecy for a long while ahead is that which is founded on Scriptural data. Hurricanes and euroclydon are to be laid away in their watery graves, and a kind of balmy atmosphere is to come in which there shall be paradise regained. All that is foretold, sometimes under one phraseology and sometimes under another. Fountains in the desert. Gardens swathing the earth with deep color of full blown rose. That settled weather of unbroken loveliness is coming as surely as the Bible is veracious, and God, who makes the seasons, can control them. About that weather it is safe a hundred or a thousand years before to make announcement. Alex. Pope set it to rhythm when he said:

The lambs, with wolves shall graze the verdant mead,
And boys in flowery bands the tiger lead,
The steer and lion in one crib shall meet,
And harmless serpents lick the pilgrim's feet.
The smiling infant in his hand shall take
The crested basilisk and speckled snake.

You and I may not live to see those skies and breathe that redolence, but the bright genial days through which we are just passing are a hint of the coming brilliancy.

Revivals.

WHEN a candidate for admission comes before session in revival times, I ask him only seven or eight questions; but when he comes during a cold state of religion, I ask him twenty questions, and get the elders to ask him as many more. In other words, I have more faith in conversions under special religious influence than under ordinary. The best luck I ever had in fishing was when I dropped the net in the bay and brought up at one haul twenty bluefish, with only three or four moss-bunkers, and the poorest luck I ever had was when, after standing two hours in the soggy meadow with one hook on the line, I felt I had a bite, and began to pull, more and more persuaded at the great size of the captive, until I flung to the shore a snapping turtle. As a Gospel fisherman I would rather run the risk of a large haul than of a solitary angling. I can soon sort out and throw overboard the few moss-bunkers.

Photographs FREE.

WE have concluded arrangements whereby we are enabled to offer for twenty-five names of adult Protestant church members, each name representing a different family, a cabinet size photograph of any one of the following persons:

1. Abbott, Lyman, Successor to the late Henry Ward Beecher as Pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, and Editor of the Outlook.
2. Baer, J. Willis, General Secretary of the Christian Endeavor Society.
3. Booth, Ballington, Commander of the Volunteers of America.
4. Booth, Mrs. Ballington, Wife of Commander Booth.
5. Clark, Francis E., President of the Christian Endeavor Society.
6. Conwell, Russell H., Pastor of the Temple (Baptist), Philadelphia, Pa.
7. Crittenton, C. N., Founder of the Florence Crittenton Missions for the reclamation of erring girls.
8. Crosby, Fanny, the blind Poetess. Author of "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," "Blessed Assurance," and hundreds of other Hymns.
9. Hall, John, Pastor Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church.
10. Harland, Marion, (Mrs. E. P. Terhune), the author of the "Home of the Bible," and Able Contributor to the Religious and Secular Press.
11. Klopsch, Louis, Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.
12. MacArthur, R. S., Pastor Calvary Baptist Church, New York.

27. Vincent, John H., Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and Founder of the Chautauqua Movement.
28. Willard, Miss Francis E., the President of the W. C. T. U.

Please observe the following rules:

1. Write on one side of the paper only.
2. Give full name in each instance, and full post office address, and state what denomination the person belongs to, whether Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Episcopalian, or Disciple.
3. Do not send any other business communication in the same letter, or the same envelope, as these letters are not opened or handled in our Counting Room.
4. Write in the lower left-hand corner of the envelope enclosing the list of names the words, "For the Million Edition."
5. Select photographs by number only, and on a separate slip of paper write your name and address in full and the number of photographs selected.
6. For 100 names and twenty-five cents in cash, we will send any six photographs of your own selection and a handsome, richly ornamented silk cloth photograph case, all charges prepaid.
7. Always make one additional selection to be substituted in case the supply of your first choice should be exhausted.
8. If you have already under some previous offer favored us with a list of names do not under this offer send us any of the same names. Let the new list be entirely distinct from any other which you may already have sent in.

BRIEF NOTES.

We regret to learn that some people in States have been victimized by persons posing as agents for this journal. It should be understood that we have no agents, and subscriptions from anyone who will not vouch for their own or those of other persons would caution our friends against intruding subscriptions to persons who are strangers.

The New York State Christian E Convention is to be held in Rochester Oct. 7th.

A Consecrated Lady who is Able to pay her own expenses is earnestly desired as teacher in a very needy field in North Carolina. Any lady may be made to Miss F. E. Uford, 7 Vill Newark, N. J.

Pastor Chiniquy, in Spite of his advanced age, is preparing for a preaching tour in the interests of Protestantism. He will do the work at the urgent request of the Protestants, and expects to devote six months to it.

French Protestants are awake to the responsibility in Madagascar. They have commissioned one missionary. A veteran African missions has offered his services, and missionaries hope to commence work soon.

Another Vote, the Third in Four Years, to be taken in Toronto on the question of surface cars on Sundays. Twice the proposal has been rejected by overwhelming majorities. The most urgent demands for the from American visitors.

The Lutheran Church in Denmark has two missionaries to Manchuria, hitherto almost exclusively by the Irish Presbyterian missions. The field is wide, and the two Presbyterians are giving a cordial welcome to the Danish brethren, and allotting them a great deal of their own.

The Girls in the Friends' Junior Christian Endeavor Society at Traverse City, Mich., have organized a band of King's Daughters, which they call the "Sunshine Opportunity Band." It was organized to carry the sunshine of God's love to the darkened homes and hearts to which it is to carry the sunshine of God's love. The praying as well as a working group of girls.

A Novel Form of Missionary Work has been undertaken by some Christian Endeavor Societies in Michigan. They have formed a Christian Endeavor Bicycle Club, and make frequent runs on the bicycles of week days into the surrounding country to help new Christian Endeavor societies, to help existing ones, and to do other religious work.

The Report of the English Baptist Missionary Society is unusually encouraging. The debt of $113,000 with which the year commences is extinguished. The total gross receipts have been $375,000—the largest income the society has ever received, excluding the Centenary Fund. Over one million missionaries have been sent out during the year.

A Congregational Church has been organized at Walker, Minn., where Evangelist C. J. Low has been laboring. The town is a supply for the Indians and a lumber town. The church now organized is the only English-speaking church within a radius of forty miles. At the initiation service some of the Council had to journey to and fro of four hundred miles.

Evangelist H. W. Brown has been spending the spring and summer in union evangelizing in Montana. He labored with success at Conda, Butte, Dillon, Boulder Valley, Great Falls, Livingston, Missoula, Phillipsburgh, Park, Helena, Kalispell, Deer Lodge, Red Lodge, B. H. Hozeman. There were a great many conversions, the greater number being men. During the weather the meetings were held in the open.

When Li Hung Chang was in London he placed a wreath of flowers on the statue of Lord Gordon. It was inscribed, "To the Soldier Friend of China—a tribute of respect from Li Hung Chang." It is evident that the Chinese statesman can forgive and forget. There was a time when he was running for his life over house roofs and through shrubbery, while Gordon, revolver in hand, was searching for him, resolved to slay him the moment he caught sight of him.

From a Report Just Issued by Dr. H. H. Roberts, stated clerk of the Presbyterian Church in America, it appears that the total number of churches in the denomination was 7,490 last year. The membership is an advance of nearly 22,000 during the year. The number of admissions by confession of faith was 104,286. The Sunday School membership increased steadily from 883,680 in 1891 to 1,000,000 in 1896. The total contributions were $14,150,407, but last year by $500,000 and the year before by $150,000.

The Danish Missionary Society Held its annual meeting recently in Copenhagen. The society comprises two branch societies, with a total membership of 20,000. The receipts for the past year amounted to about $27,500. The first mission of the society was in Southern India, since which, however, they have taken up missions work in Africa. Four missionaries are ready to be sent out to Africa, and six to be sent out to India. The society discussed whether a third mission to Middle India, should be undertaken.

Dr. Barnardo States that "an instructive and pathetic custom still prevails in Munich, Germany, of sending destitute children to a charitable institution. On his arrival at the institution, the child is given a photograph, and is required to make a solemn promise that he will keep it as a reminder of the state from which he was saved, and of the goodness shown to him."

Grace Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., which we published a picture recently, is a fine edifice, as it is built in instalments. When the treasury is empty, the church closes when the treasury is empty. The church is boarded up and the congregation is in the fragment, until it has five members present. Then the church is opened. In the Grace Baptist Church, Boston, two in the Union Missionary Institute, Brooklyn, and one in the Marine Institute, Marion, N. Y. It also has two missionaries in Africa, Rev. Norman W. F. and wife.

Clouds Hide the Eclipse.

REPORTS now received from the various expeditions sent out from different countries, to observe the solar eclipse of Aug. 9, show that the astronomers were disappointed. The phenomenon was hidden behind clouds, and few of the observers saw any glimpse of it during the two hours of total obscuration. As will be seen by the accompanying map, the path of the eclipse was through Japan, Siberia, Norway, Zembla, and northern Norway. As the moon in its journey around the earth, passes between it and the sun, while the earth is swiftly turning on its own axis revolving on its revolution around the sun, the shadow it casts on the earth takes a curved path, about one hundred miles wide which this year lay as shown in the map. Although the sun is nearly four hundred times the size of the moon, it is completely covered by the moon in a total eclipse, because the moon is so much nearer to us, just as a silver dollar held close to the eye would blot out a landscape. But although the vast mass of the sun is covered, there is a mysterious halo of light around it, shining outside of the moon's edge. This luminous envelope as appeared in the eclipse of April 16, 1893, is shown in the illustration. It is not visible at ordinary times, but it is a magnificent spectacle when the sun is covered. Astronomers are anxious to study it, and when the total eclipse they made elaborate preparations for observing it. Two expeditions, equipped with modern instruments, were sent for the purpose from this country to Japan, one of them led by Prof. D. Todd of Amherst College, and the other by Prof. J. M. Schaeberle of Lick Observatory. British expeditions went to Norway and the Isle of Yezo, Japan. The American expeditions report only partial success, and the British say that no observations of scientific importance were made. At Vadsø, in northern Norway, the conditions were exceptionally favorable if the sky had been clear. The view extended up a fiord to the opposite mountain thirty miles distant. The observers saw the deep purple shadow advance with mazy and sweep over the mountains in their outlines became invisible. It traveled a mile every two seconds. As it reached the station of observation, the light was no greater than at full moon, but at the distance, the mountains outside the path of the shadow could be described based in the sunlight. At last the darkness lifted and the light came with startling suddenness. It was not that the sun became visible, but when the moon had passed by, the sun illumined the clouds and gave the usual light of a cloudy day. The mystery of the corona and the gigantic streamers will therefore, unless other observers were more successful, have to wait for solution to some future opportunity. It is suggested that perhaps these repeated disappointments may lead some ingenious scientist to find a method of hiding the sun from his instruments and so produce eclipse conditions artificially. Then the corona and streamers may be seen and photographed on any sunny day. It is not easy, however, to so cover the face of the sun when it is shining in its strength. Unhappily what men cannot do with the natural sun, they do only too easily with the Sun of Righteousness:

For his sins have hidden his face from you. (Isa. 59:2.)

Copy Your Identification.

One of the lessons of the recent hot wave is urged by the New York Herald. It says that inquiries for missing persons have since then been received from many places. Among the large number of persons who were prostrated by the heat and were sent to the hospitals where they died, were many who had no means of identification on their persons. The sudden emergency found the hospitals unprepared to deal with so large a number of corpses. They were kept at the morgue for forty-eight hours and were then shipped to Hart's Island for burial in Potter's Field. The majority of these were persons whose hands and dress indicated that they belonged to a class not usually buried there. Probably some of them are the persons for whom inquiry is now being made. The authorities did their utmost to discover the identity in each case, from marks on the clothing or papers in the pockets and in every instance, where any clue was obtained, the friends were notified. But when no such evidence could be found, they had no alternative but to send the body to the Potter's Field. Many families would be deeply mortified at such disposal of their dead and the Herald advises all who dread a similar fate to always carry with them their names and address, so that if accident befalls them, their friends may be informed. This may prevent their bodies going to a nameless grave. It is, however, much more important in view of the possibility of sudden death, that precautions be taken to insure their souls going to the abode of eternal life. They who are in Christ may be assured that no mistake can happen about them.

The Lord knoweth them that are his. (II. Tim. 2:19.)

Involuntary Journey.

One of the employees of the New Jersey Central Railroad was inspecting the freight cars which had just come into the depot at Jersey City on August 28, when he was startled by hearing a noise in one of the cars. As it was unsealed, he had supposed that it was empty. He opened the doors and, to his astonishment, found four little boys inside. They were badly frightened, but were glad to be released. They said that they lived in Philadelphia. They had been playing in the freight yard there, and had climbed into the empty car for shelter from a shower. They were playing inside when some one came along and banged the doors shut, not knowing of their being there. They kicked the doors and shouted but could not make any one hear. Presently they felt the car in motion, and they became alarmed. The car made occasional stops, some of them so long that the boys in the darkness thought that a whole day passed. The eldest was only thirteen years old, and his companions a year or two younger. The time passed slowly, for they were too frightened to play. At last, the door was opened and the boys learned that they had been prisoners for sixteen hours. They were taken to the police station, and telegrams were sent to their parents. It will be well if from their painful experience they learn a lesson of caution as to the places in which they seek amusement or shelter in later life. They will see many who contemplated merely an hour or two of diversion, entrapped and carried swiftly to their ruin.

Therefore my people are gone into captivity because they have no knowledge. (Isa. 5:12.)

Danger to Rescuers.

A press dispatch from Hazleton, Pa., describes a perilous work of rescue. There had been a fall of coal from the roof of the Coleraine cutting and a laborer had been caught under it. He was completely buried except his head, which alone projected from the debris. His comrades went to his assistance, but the coal was wedged about his shoulders and body so tightly that he could not be drawn out. It was necessary to remove it gently by hand, piece by piece. Willing hands were soon busy at this work when an ominous rumble was heard overhead. The coal in the roof was "working" again. Every man ran for his life. But no coal fell that time. The men returned and, to protect themselves, put up temporary supports to the gradually loosening masses of coal above them. Refreshment was brought to the man who was partially buried in his living grave. He was conscious, but complained of the pressure of the coal on his body. Several times the fall of small pieces of coal drove the rescuers away, but each time they returned, and after ten hours of hard work succeeded in releasing the man. Five minutes after he was taken out, the whole gaining his strength, but his mental condition is very confused. He is unable to remember anything that has occurred. He cannot recollect even the events of the day immediately preceding; but he has a peculiar faculty of prevision. He mentioned an event as having occurred, describing it minutely which occurred several hours afterwards exactly as he had described it. He also stated that he had received a letter from his mother and narrated its contents, though he had received no such letter. But the next morning's mail brought the letter, the contents of which were precisely as he had stated them. The physicians cannot account for the mental phenomenon and say that it is, so far as they know, unprecedented. Perhaps, if it were more common there would be less difficulty in getting men to attend to the concerns of their souls. If they foresaw the fearful consequences of neglecting them they would better appreciate the offer of salvation.

Lord, make me to know my end and the measure of my days what it is. (Ps. 39:4.)

A Child in an Ash-barrel.

A New York policeman made a startling discovery a few days ago. He noticed an intoxicated woman walking unsteadily through one of the streets in the upper part of the city. She had an infant in her arms which she was holding as carefully as her condition permitted. The policeman was reluctant to arrest her, as she appeared to be making her way home quietly. About an hour afterwards, as he was patrolling his beat, he heard the cry of a child. Soon he heard the cry again, and this time guided by the sound he crossed the street to where a half-empty ash-barrel stood on the edge of the pavement. Looking in, he saw an infant a few months old. He lifted it from its bed of cinders and refuse and started with it to the station-house. On his way he saw again the intoxicated woman whom he had seen before. She had no baby in her arms this time, and the policeman suspected that the child he had found in the ash-barrel was the one she had been carrying. He arrested her, and she was locked up to get sober, while the infant was placed in the matron's charge. When the woman was arraigned the next morning she admitted the identity of the child, but professed not to remember putting it in the ash-barrel. She was not its mother, but had been hired by the mother to take care of it. She had been shamefully false to her trust. Perhaps no mother would have done so heartless a thing, but there are many parents whose negligence of their duty to their children is infinitely more disastrous, and is, too, a betrayal of trust. To every parent God speaks the words addressed to the mother of Moses.

Take this child and nurse it for me. (Ex. 2:9.)

A Business Disaster.

Much surprise and excitement were caused in New York on August 26, by the closing of the great business house established by the late A. T. Stewart, nearly seventy-three years ago. There are few people in the most distant States who have not heard the fame of Stewart's store, or the story of the poor Irish clerk who started in business with a few hundred dollars of borrowed capital and made a fortune of thirty million dollars with it. The annual return of the business when A. T. Stewart died, was over forty million dollars and an army of two thousand employees was maintained to conduct it. The great merchant had several branches and mills here and across the Atlantic, in which goods were manufactured for the business. The history of the house for fifty-three years was one of continuous growth and prosperity. During the subsequent twenty years it has been one of decadence. The collapse surprised the public, but it had been expected by financiers and by the creditors, who knew that the funds of the house were extremely low and that for some time past it has had a difficulty in meeting its payments. From the statement made by the assignee it would appear that for years past, there has been a constant drain on private resources and that much of the money that A. T. Stewart left behind him has gone in the effort to avert the failure that at last became unavoidable. The great house collapsed at last and is now only a memory. Thus has the wise king's warning been fulfilled:

Riches are not forever and doth the crown endure to every generation? (Prov. 27:24.)

roof, weighing several thousand tons fell on the place where the rescuers had been at work. They had a narrow escape and they knew all the time they were toiling to rescue their comrade that they were in danger of just that calamity. It speaks well for human nature that men will thus venture their lives to save another from death. There ought to be still greater devotion and earnestness to save a soul that is in danger of eternal death, and a sure reward is promised to all who succeed.

Let him know that he who converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death and shall hide a multitude of sins. (James 5:20.)

A Reversed Memory.

A singular mental phenomenon is reported in a press dispatch from Portland, Ore. It appears that a young man whose father is very wealthy left that city recently on a pleasure excursion. He was liberally supplied with funds, which he spent freely. He finally went to Chicago, where he indulged in a period of dissipation. One night there, by accident or in a fit of depression, he left the gas in his bed-room turned on unlighted. He was found before life was extinct and the hospital doctors managed to save him from dying. His father was notified and went at once to the Chicago hospital to watch over his recovery. The young man is slowly re-

Outdoor Life in Japan.

Picturesquely Dressed Groups in Beautiful Gardens—A Missionary Excursion.

MUCH of the life of the "better class" in Japan is spent out of doors, and in this custom they are heartily joined by resident Europeans and Americans. One of the photographic illustrations on this page shows a party of missionaries on a pleasure excursion to Enoshima and Kamakura. They came thither in two railway cars, and a very pleasant party they were. Japanese railway cars are modeled somewhat after the European pattern, and divided into four classes, charging from four cents a mile down to one cent. The missionaries thought it rather odd to be shut up in the cars and to see neither conductor nor brakeman until they reached their destination. On leaving the train, they were conveyed in jirikishas, to the sea-shore where they gathered curious shells for an hour or more. Enoshima is a picturesque pile of graves, temples, and terraces, with stairways of stone, clumps of bamboo, and wild flowers. Nearby is a large cave which they visited. It is 400 feet long, with a number of connecting passages. At one point the sea rolls in for a considerable distance. There is a temple-like chamber at one end of the cave, and led by a guide and lighted by candles, the missionaries saw themselves surrounded by idols, and shrines of Benten, the Japanese Venus, the goddess of the place. They explored several other passages, paid a few small coins to the native priests who keep the temple, drank of a cool spring that bubbles up in the cave, and again sought the open air. After resting awhile, they again entered the jirikishas and set out for Kamakura, where they viewed the old temples and the colossal idol, Dai Butsu, which has already been described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some time ago.

Another photograph presents a glimpse of the domestic side of Japanese life. The Japanese never wear their shoes in the house. They wear in place of a stocking a sort of thick white cloth in the fashion of a gaiter, or perhaps more like a mitten, as it has a separate compartment for the great toe; this is for allowing their sandals to be fastened to their feet. When the weather is muddy, instead of putting on rubbers, the Japanese puts on "rain shoes," which are raised several inches from the ground on a couple of blocks of wood. When the Japanese woman wishes to wash a garment nicely, she draws it apart, washes it, and then stretches it upon a board to dry. If it has faded, it is often re-dyed, and when it is made up again looks as good as new. One sees this little operation going on quite often when passing through the streets of Japan.

What we Should Live For.

It is astonishing to reflect that the vast majority of mankind, through a sad inherited fatuity, are apt to miss the very object in life for which they were created, and for which the Father of us all intended us to pursue. Some live for riches and pleasure, others for fame, still others for ambition, and others again for the gratification of the senses. Apparently there is in some lives no higher motive than the development of the passions, and those qualities that make man a foe to his race and generation, and a beast of prey. There are many, who stand well in the eyes of the world, yet whose lives will not bear the scrutiny of conscience.

Train your children in early youth to live for a right purpose. Tell them that unless they can so direct their acts, their thoughts, and their minds, as to make some portion of their fellow beings happier and better, they will be failures. A flower that gave neither bloom nor perfume, a fruitless orchard, a dry river, a desert mirage, are not greater mockeries of what they should be than a cold, selfish, loveless, worldly heart, which has failed to fulfill its right mission on the earth. It was Dr. Chalmers who wrote these burning words which might well be learned by the young: "Thousands of men tion of her efforts at marketing in that country: "When we set up our little household, I looked forward to going to market with the same pleasure that duty had given me in the north, but it resolved itself into a queer adventure. Jose kindly told me it was not the custom for ladies to go to market, but we were not deterred or dismayed, and one fine morning found Mrs. S., Kit, and myself, escorted by Jose, walking the streets to the market.

"By the time we reached the market place we and our followers made quite a procession. The market is in a court between high buildings. Here small tables and bits of straw matting are placed on all sides, and upon these the men and women display their wares. As we approached, every vender shouted prices and names of articles, begging the strange ladies to buy. My breath was fairly taken away, and I appealed to Jose—such a reproachful 'I told you so' look as he gave me! But he laid about him smartly with his hands, pushing back the too curious throng, and managed to gain a pathway for us.

"Vegetables, fruits, and goods of all descriptions were arranged in heaps; here one can find the products of every zone and clime, and all are very cheap. These

From the wily tempter's snare,
From the depth of dark despair,

As he wanders far from home Guard him through life's journey on,

And when life is ended here
Safe at last,
Free from earthly strife and sin,
May he pass;
To the higher realms above,
Where, redeemed by thy dear love,
Saved at last our prayers will prove,

FLOWERS FOR THE TABLE.

FLOWERS as a table decoration are again coming into popular favor, a leading London journal—The Leader—which is regarded as an authority on ters of taste says that the most noticeable feature in practical decoration is the use of flowers. There is nothing that will be more beautiful than the Louis XV. basket which is illuminated from inside by lighting the mass of beautiful flowers with which it is decorated, and the enormous weight of satin upon which it is suspended from the ceiling. These baskets were formerly set in the corners of rooms, but they took up a great deal of space and were to be drawn close by the place by pulling skirts. Suspended overhead, this is avoided and the effect is prettier.

vendore are sheltered from the intensely hot rays of the sun by crude awnings of cloth or matting. They all are polite, and with their bright smiles they easily gain customers. Under nearly every awning, mixed up with the vegetables or flowers, are fat, round babies, often with their black eyes the only clean spots on them, but sweet and charming for all that. The flower market is the place of enchantment, for the love of flowers is a strong trait of character in these people. Here we saw men and women arranging great bunches of most exquisite blossoms with a delicacy of taste which both delighted and surprised us. And they were so cheap!

Economy in the Home.

These are the days when a prudent and careful mother, appreciating the difficulties and the struggles the father may have to face in the business world, will consider whether some saving cannot be effected in the home expenditures. She will bring her children to love the simplicities rather than the follies and the extravagances of life. Simple pleasures may be less lively, less costly and less enticing it is true; but they leave no hurtful impression. One of the best things we can do for children is to accustom them to a simple life, to fortify them by it, as long as we can, to forewarn them by fear of the dangers attached to costly and foolish indulgences. A mother who does this, and who both in dress, at table, and out of doors, helps to cut off all needless expenditures, will prove a blessing to many a weary overworked husband, and a benefactor to the entire household.

master-piece for the table is a combination of white sweet peas, and the delicate feathery white gypsophilum. All decorations are made low, springing from almost invisible foundations, every leaf and bloom asserting its individuality, never were orchids more in demand, or those who cannot afford to invest in the long iris intermixed with grasses will serve. Ribbon bows are not admitted to the table now.

Mrs. Gladstone's Task.

In a recent article on the Gladstone family, Mr. W. T. Stead gives this attractive picture of Mrs. Gladstone's devotion to her husband: A famous poet, about the time of Mr. Gladstone's wedding, wrote a poem addressed to Mrs. Gladstone, before her marriage was known as a beautiful Miss Glynne, and in this poem he set before her the task which to the best of her ability she has performed. It was her duty, he said, "to soothe, in many a toil-worn hour, the noble heart which thou hast won." This she has performed admirably. She was a capital house-mother, faithful and attentive; an admirable nurse, who studied her husband's doctor studies his patient; for all his physical and social needs, she was all that could be desired. The poet wrote:

Be thou a balmy breeze to him,
A fountain singing at his side;
His star whose light is never dim,
A pole star through the waste to guide.

"Balmy breeze" she was no doubt, "singing fountain," too; but it was her role to be a pole star to a great career.

breathe, move, and live; pass off the stage of life, and are heard of no more? They did not a particle of good and none were blessed by them; none could point to them as the instrument of their redemption; not a line they wrote, not a word they spoke, could be recalled, and so they perished—their light went out in darkness, and they were not remembered more than the insects of yesterday. Will you thus live and die? Live for something. Do good, and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storms of time can never destroy. Write your name by kindness, love, and mercy on the hearts of the thousands you have come in contact with year by year, and you will never be forgotten. No, your name, your deeds, will be legible on the heart you leave behind."

ialo 2 : 112.

EVERY generation must depend on the generation preceding it for its enlightenment. It is so in education, in science and in morals, and it is peculiarly so in religion. In this dispensation, God is calling nations or classes, but individuals. It depends, therefore, on the generation whether the generation shall be regenerated, or farther than this, or farther than this. If every soul in a generation were regenerated, it would be necessary to continue the work. Every child in the world would be called upon to make the effort that he might be regenerated into the Kingdom of Christ. It is conceivable that a whole nation might be regenerated, and in such a case it should be a matter of worldlings. It is a matter of importance that continuous effort be made to evangelize the world. And the result is done the better. It is much easier to convert a man an adult, but it is much easier to convert a child. The Christian who is converted in his youth is a better and stronger Christian than he who is converted in his maturity. Our hope, therefore, is in the children. In childhood and youth the prospect of conversion is small and the results of conversion are poor. It follows that Home Missionary work is a more restricted work than the work of the general missionary. It is the most hopeful and most productive. The missionary work is done in the home. The mother has an opportunity and the work of the Sunday School teacher. He works in good ground because the soil is trodden hard, and the thorns spring to choke the good seed. It is the work of the preacher. He has to promise the Gospel to those who do not know it, and to persuade those who do know it to live it. He has the other duty of fostering and developing a religious life in the soul. It has been implanted, and other duties are his. Any preacher who lives the pulpit without showing the way of salvation to the sinner incurs an awful penalty. There may be some soul in his congregation who has that opportunity, and no other, of coming to Christ. He has some dispensation of grace which may ensue before the opportunity occurs. He has some field of Home Missionary work which is the meaning of the Gospel applied to it—the work of those who have seen the other chances. The message of the Gospel is to be carried into the lanes and alleys of the city to the halt and the lame and the blind. Missionaries are employed in the duty and their labors are greatly increased. But every Christian ought to be a missionary. In the office and the home, the place of recreation, there are opportunities for Home Missionary effort. Every Christian has the disadvantage of being a stranger to the people he approaches. There are some in every community who some Christian can approach as a neighbor. In business relations and as a neighbor he comes in contact with his fellow-men and should be concerned for their spiritual welfare. If they are not already Christians they become his special charge. Every Christian, therefore, ought to be a Home Missionary.

Far From Home.

FAR from my heavenly home,
Far from my Father's breast,
Fainting I cry, "Blest Spirit, come
And speed me to my rest."

Upon the willows long
My harp has silent hung;
How should I sing a cheerful song
Till thou inspire my tongue?

My spirit homeward turns
And fain would hither flee;
My heart, O Zion, droops and yearns,
When I remember thee.

To thee, to thee I press,
A dark and toilsome road:
When shall I pass the wilderness,
And reach the saint's abode?

God of my life, be near:
On thee my hopes I cast;

Oh, guide me through the desert here,
And bring me home at last.

The Cross.

'TIS my happiness below
Not to live without the cross;
But the Saviour's power to know,
Sanctifying every loss.

Trials must and will befall;
But with humble faith to see
Love inscribed upon them all—
This is happiness to me.

Did I meet no trials here,
No chastisement by the way,
Might I not with reason fear
I should prove a castaway?

Trials make the promise sweet:
Trials give new life to prayer;
Bring me to my Saviour's feet,
Lay me low and keep me there.

Prophetic Parables.

The Parable of the Tares in its Prophetic Aspect.

BY REV. GEO. H. PEMBER, M. A.

ONE step farther in the history of the church is presented in the Parable of the Tares. The good seed has been sown, and one-fourth has fallen on good ground. We follow the fortunes of this fourth, the other three-fourths having failed of fruition. The life of even this fourth is not unmingled good. A malignant enemy follows the sower, and, while men are sleeping, scatters tares among the wheat, and then steals away unperceived. The tares used for this evil purpose are still only too well known in Palestine, and so nearly resemble good wheat in their growth, that it is almost impossible to distinguish them from it until the ear begins to ripen, when their fruit becomes black instead of yellow. In due time this proof of the admixture appears, and the servants of the lord of the field inform him of it, and ask if they shall go and pull up the noxious weeds. But he, after explaining that an enemy has done the mischief, tells them that the crops are now so inextricably mingled that they must be left to grow together until the harvest, when the reapers shall separate them, and shall bind the tares in bundles to burn them, and gather the wheat into the garner.

This Parable also is interpreted by the Lord himself. The field is the world, and the enemy the devil; but the meaning of the seed is not the same as in the first Parable; for it no longer signifies doctrines, but persons. "The good seed are the children of the kingdom; and the tares are the children of the wicked one." The latter are those hypocrites who are found to be suitable instruments for developing the deep and treacherous designs of Satan; who, though they know not Christ, will foist themselves among Christians, and make it the business of their lives to spread corruption, either in doctrine or behavior.

Many such men crept into the church even in apostolic times; but it is the history of the second and third centuries which affords the most terrible proof of the Lord's foreknowledge. During that period multitudes of grievous wolves entered stealthily into the fold, not sparing the flock; and many arose speaking perverse things to draw away the disciples after them. Then heresies began to spring up on all sides, heresies of every imaginable form and hue, and resulting in sects which in manifold ways weakened or altogether destroyed the power of the Word of God. The universal Church became corrupt, and has never thrown off the taints of this epoch: to the present day every Christian sect bears traces of them upon its tenets or ritual.

In regard to the harvest, a difficulty has arisen in the minds of many, because the command, "Gather ye together first the tares," seems to imply that Christ will execute judgment upon the wicked before he deals with his Church. It is, however, impossible that such a sequence of events could be intended, or this passage would stand alone, and oppose itself to the general testimony of Scripture.

We may, perhaps, add that a farmer would not be likely to trouble himself about the tares, provided they were carefully picked out of the wheat, until he had safely conveyed the latter to its receptacle.

Running the Gauntlet.

He opened his case and said that I should find his cigars better and he would give me one if I liked, so I gave him the cigar. I had just bought, and he gave me one of his, and that is how I got the cigar. I am innocent of the trick."

"Why for you!" cried one of the boys. "See cheers for Pat Green!" said the other: whereupon Seymour walked away and shook hands with Pat and so we re-embarked in the wagon again.

Ol Smithers drove on without noticing my party, and three miles more of indifference and were to be travelled over. It had become quite dark, and the old horse crept along at a slow pace.

"Tell us what happened under water," quietly said Seymour, and all drew breath with eyes, ears, and mouths open. "Well, this story is as hard to believe as the other. I dived straight down and worked my way to the bottom of the river, and I had a handful of mussels. I could see the wharf for half a mile. I saw the wharf, the ship, and plenty of fish. It required great effort to rise, as I came up like a bottle; but as I started I received an awful blow on my thigh, which nearly knocked me flat out of me; and turning around I saw a monstrous fish, six or seven feet long, which had hit me with its snout, and then swam after me. I struck out for the top, but it gave me another blow on the back with its tail, just before I reached the surface! I was scared, I tell you, and have made my last dive in deep water. I feel very sore now."

"Big fish story!" said Hill.

"I love that, if you can!"

"Right!" cried Pat in a half angry tone. "I can prove it; and throwing off his coat, vest, and his shirt, he exhibited an ugly bruise as big as a tea saucer. There was a wound, too, on his leg, and as they were not there when he entered the water, all voted Green for him. If he had not been swallowed by the whale, he had certainly received the treatment from the head and tail of the turgeon.

When he was reached at last, and all separated in good humor. Milton and George had walked homeward together. George was silent for some yards; then he began to a dispute which had occurred the day before. "Doc, I cannot understand why you didn't thrash Casselton to-day for calling you a liar."

"Well, in the first place," replied Seymour, "I am not a liar; and, secondly, saying so will never make me one; and, thirdly, to fight about it, and get whipped, or whip him, which ever might happen, would neither prove nor disprove his assertion. On the contrary, it would have engendered bad feelings, stirred up passions, and led to hatred and sin. We must love our enemies and do good to the who despitefully use us."

"But, Doc, neither common sense, nor custom, nor any rule of society, would allow a fellow to be insulted and whipped," replied Browne.

"I am governed by higher rules than the rule of honor or society, my dear fellow," replied Milton. "As a Christian, I must try to do as Christ did in all things and obey his commands. One of the most difficult is his law as to resentment, but I think he likes to have us obey it."

"Let me remember a time when you did not. You and I had a grand fight once, you know."

"Oh, yes, that was because you objected to my being escort to your cousin, Carrie Well. I should have the same impulse now, but I have learned that I must control my impulses. I should have enjoyed giving that lad a thrashing to-day, but I am glad I did not. I have found out that when one obeys Christ about anything, one is happier afterwards, than if one follows one's inclinations."

"Strange doctrine that; I don't understand it, Doc, and couldn't do it," said Browne; and the friends separated.

BANKRUPT SALE! Eries, etc., Columbus, Ramblers, Second-Hd., A. C. WARNER & PPO, 221 Wabash Ave.

So many people are requesting us to continue the following offer on account of the hot weather that we have decided to continue it two months longer, until NOVEMBER 1st, 1896.

ELEGANT FRUIT-DISH FREE

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past two years know that when the Leonard Mfg. Co. make an offer—it is bound to be a grand bargain, no matter how impossible it may seem. Our name has become a household word over the continent—in fact, is a guarantee of honest goods and square dealing.

Now we will make an offer that will startle you:

This elegant Fruit-Dish (see cut) is strictly high-grade, and has an elaborate design of the latest and most exquisite finish; the bowl is an excellent imitation of cut glass, and the pedestal is triple silver-plated on hard white metal. It stands 14 inches high and is a beautiful ornament for any table or sideboard. The dish would cost you at any jewelry store from $4.00 to $6.00. We offer to send it free, absolutely free to any one who will do a little work for us. The work we ask you to do is not hard; it can be done right in your own neighborhood. Simply call on your friends and show them our Elegant World's Fair Souvenir Tea Spoons. Nearly every one you call on will want a set of them. Secure orders for six (6) sets of our souvenir spoons at 99c per set and send us the amount ($5.94), and we will, immediately on receipt, ship the spoons and with it this handsome Fruit or Berry-Dish, as a premium. Remember we charge nothing for the dish. It is entirely free.

Evidences of good taste and refinement are perhaps better displayed at the table than elsewhere; the linen, silver, china and glassware all indicate the ignorant or educated taste; not always so much from the intrinsic value of the article (as that only suggests the wealth of the possessor), as from their worth in utility and beauty. This premium will be once recognized for its beauty and uses. The glass portion is an excellent imitation of a piece of cut glass worth about $25.00; it is detachable from the triple-silver-plated pedestal, thus permitting it to be used for other purposes and all making the cleaning a mere pleasure.

The World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons have been advertised so widely during the last two years that they are well known throughout the land. A set is composed of 6 full size Teaspoons, heavy triple-plated on white metal, with the bowl gold plated both inside and outside. They are not the common washed-over stuff, but are stamped "Leonard Mfg. Co. A. 1," which is a guarantee of reliability and square dealing. Each bowl contains a different building. There are 12 different buildings, as follows:

Set No. 2 comprises the Manufacturers, Horticultural, Woman's, Fisheries, Machinery, and Transportation building. Set 3 includes the Administration, Art, Agricultural, Electrical, Mining and Government buildings.

Be sure to specify in your order how many sets of each kind you desire. Sets will not be broken, so do not ask it.

The price at which we sell these spoons (6 for 99c) is so remarkably low that every housekeeper can afford to have a set. Remember these spoons are not Orange Spoons, nor "After Dinner" Coffee Spoons, but are regular, full size teaspoons.

This is such a grand offer that we caution you not to delay getting your orders in at once. Under no circumstances will this offer hold good after November 1st, 1896. It is made only for the summer trade and the time will positively not be extended.

We know you will be delighted with the goods; read what our customers think of them. We receive, unsolicited, hundreds of letters like the following, daily:

LOWELL, Mass., June 15, 1896.

GENTLEMEN: The Souvenir Spoons for Mrs. Emma Brown came to hand this A.M. She is very much pleased with them and particularly so with your promptness. Accept my own thanks. Yours truly,

P. PHILETUS BURNHAM.

Those Souvenir Teaspoons are a grand bargain at 99c. I sent for sets Nos. 2 and 3 and have used them. To say that I am satisfied does not give the right expression. I believe that I am proud of them. I would like to work for Leonard Manufacturing Company and secure some of the prize pieces, but could not act in the capacity of an agent as I seldom go away from home—being very deaf—but when I see anything I want recommended, and have the money to pay for it, I am not afraid to invest.

Our Sister Republic.

Moral, and Religious Condition of the People of Mexico — The Neglected Peasantry — Interesting Types of Humble Life.

MEXICO, says a well-known writer, has inherited the vices of two continents. This, he adds, is especially true of the lower classes of the Mexican people, in whom the Indian blood strives with the Spanish for preponderance. But the truth, as it appears to any fair-minded observer while traveling in that country, is that this condition is to be regarded as rather the misfortune than the fault of the Mexican peasantry. Poor and ignorant, but rarely wicked, the peasant has some of those deep qualities but with the peasantry. The street scene in which the overladen donkey—probably bound for market—figures so prominently, is a familiar one in Mexico City, where hucksters of fruit, basket-weavers, and other vendors seem to compose a considerable part of the population. Many of these hucksters are women, dark-skinned, black-haired, short in stature, but not ungainly nor uncomely, their bright-hued skirts and wraps adding a dash of color to a costume otherwise somewhat dull.

Another character of the same class is the basket peddler, whose skill in preserving the pyramidal position of his stock, which he carries on his back supported by a head-strap, is really remarkable, seeing that he requires little less space to move in than would a load of hay. Still another variation of the same type is found in the Carbonero or coal vender, whose staple serve a snowy whiteness; yet with the national love of display, he persists in wearing white to the same extent as the tamale-seller or the other artists of his class. Representatives of all these scattered industries may be met at the public market-place almost daily. There one sees Indian-looking women in blue cloth gowns and men in greasy-looking jackets, and hats several sizes too high and wide for our ideas of comfort, and all busy selling tortillas, tamales, sweet drinks, and fruits. On the whole, the population looks poor and degraded, and the Indian type seems to strongly predominate over the Spanish. In the City of Mexico, the lavenderas or washerwomen are, industrially speaking, a class apart. It is a pretty sight to see some half a hundred or more of them at work together, scouring, scrubbing, and rinsing the piles of linen, until they attain a pearly whiteness. Unlike the laundresses of Nice, whose spacious wash-house is on the banks of a river, the lavenderas of time in Mexican history. After the liberation of the country from the Spanish yoke in 1810 Mexico passed under the domination of a tyranny far more oppressive than Spain had exerted. The Romish ecclesiastics were the only educated class capable of ruling the country. Practically they governed it until the rise of Juarez in STREET SCENE IN THE CITY OF MEXICO.

Mexico City have a comparatively small stream running through their capacious workshop, where the bare-armed women face each other in two long rows and chat together to lighten their labor. Six, seven, or even eight hours are considered a light day's work, for the Mexicans of the peasant class are strong and willing and inured to toil, although they have not the stamina of the natives of a more northerly clime. As a whole, they are wofully poor and ignorant, and their ambitions are limited by a very narrow horizon, indeed.

Much has been said of the spiritual darkness of Mexico, but when we reflect that it was not until 1827 that the first extensive consignment of Bibles entered the country, there is really occasion for surprise that there is so much spiritual enlightenment as is found there. Those Bibles in the Spanish tongue, read by stealth, were the pioneers of the work carried on by brave missionaries and Chris-

1848, and it was not until 1867, when Juarez became really the President of the Republic, that the grasp of the Romish hierarchy on the vitals of the state loosened. By that time the bulk of the property and wealth of the country had passed into the hands of the priests. Nearly half the real estate in the City of Mexico was owned by the archbishop, while the aggregate income of the priests of all orders was twenty-five million dollars. At this time the government was practically bankrupt. In the struggle under Juarez and Diaz for the liberation of the country and its financial rehabilitation, the patriots had no more formidable foes than the priests. They held the property of the nation and they refused to be taxed or to contribute in any way to the expenses of the government. It is not surprising that, knowing no religion but the Roman Catholic, the patriots of Mexico should have come to regard religion as the enemy of liberty. A

The Cities Saved.

on the Text: Zech. 8: 5. And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof.

LIMPSES of our cities redeemed! Now, boys and girls who play in the streets run such risks that multitudes of them end in ruin. But, in the coming time spoken of, our cities will be so moral that lads and lasses shall be as safe in the public thoroughfares as in the nursery.

Pulpit and printing-press for the most part in our day are busy in discussing the condition of the cities at this time; but would it not be healthfully encouraging to all Christian workers, and to all who are toiling to make the world better, if we should for a little while look forward to the time when our cities shall be revolutionized by the Gospel of the Son of God, and all the darkness of sin and trouble and crime and suffering shall be gone from the world?

Every man has a pride in the city of his nativity or residence, if it be a city distinguished for any dignity or prowess. Cæsar boasted of his native Rome, Virgil of Mantua, Lycurgus of Sparta, Demosthenes of Athens, Archimedes of Syracuse, and Paul of Tarsus. I should have suspicion of base-heartedness in a man who had no especial interest in the city of his birth or residence—no exhilaration at the evidence of its prosperity or its artistic embellishments, or its intellectual advancement.

I have noticed that a man never likes a city where he has not behaved well! People who have had a free ride in the prison van never like the city that furnishes the vehicle. When I find Argos, and Rhodes, and Smyrna trying to prove themselves the birthplace of Homer, I conclude at once that Homer behaved well. He liked them and they liked him. We must not war on laudable city pride, or with the idea of building ourselves up at any time, try to pull others down. Boston must continue to point to its Faneuil Hall and to its Common, and to its superior educational advantages. Philadelphia must continue to point to its Independence Hall, and its Mint, and its Girard College. Washington must continue to point to its wondrous Capitoline buildings. If I should find a man coming from any city, having no pride in that city, that city having been the place of his nativity, or now being the place of his residence, I would feel like asking: "What mean thing have you done there? What outrageous thing have you been guilty of that you do not like the place?"

I think we ought—and I take it for granted you are interested in this great work of evangelizing the cities and saving the world—we ought to toil with the sunlight in our faces. We are not fighting in a miserable Bull Run of defeat. We are on our way to final victory. We are not following the rider on the black horse, leading us down to death and darkness and doom, but the rider on the white horse, with the moon under his feet and the stars of heaven for his tiara. Hail, Conqueror, hail!

I know there are storms, and there are sins, and there are sufferings all around about us; but as in some bitter, cold winter, when we are threatened and surrounded by the cold winds, and we are around us to keep our thumbs from freezing, we think of the warm spring day that will come after the winter, so in the winter night we look up and see the northern lights, the windows of heaven illuminated by some great victory—just so we look up from the night of suffering and sorrow and wretchedness in our cities, and we see a light streaming through from the other side, and we know we are on the way to morning—more than that, on the way to "a morning without clouds."

I want you to understand, all you who are toiling for Christ, that the castles of sin are all going to be captured. The victory for Christ in these great towns is going to be so complete that not a man on earth, or an angel in heaven, or a devil in hell will dispute it. How do I know? I know just as certainly as God lives and that this is holy truth. The old Bible is full of it. If the nation is to be saved, of course all the cities are to be saved. It makes a great difference with you and with me whether we are toiling on toward a defeat, or toiling on toward a victory.

Now, in this municipal elevation of which I speak, I have to remark there will be greater financial prosperity than our cities have ever seen. Some people seem to have a morbid idea of the millennium, and they think when the better time comes to our cities and the world people will give their time up to psalm-singing and the relating of their religious experience, and, as all social life will be purified there will be no hilarity, and, as all business will be purified, there will be no enterprise. There is no ground for such an absurd anticipation. In the time of which I speak, where now one fortune is made, the will be a hundred fortunes made. We all know business prosperity depends upon confidence between man and man. Now when that time comes of which I speak, and when all double dealing, all dishonesty, and all fraud are gone out of commercial circles, thorough confidence will be established, and there will be better business done, and larger fortunes gathered, and mightier successes achieved.

The great business disasters of this country have come from the work of godless speculators and infamous stock gamblers. The great foe to business is crime. When the right shall have hurled back the wrong, and shall have purified the commercial code, and shall have thundered down fraudulent establishments, and shall have put into the hands of honest men the keys of business, blessed time for the bargain-makers. I am not talking an abstraction, I am not making a guess. I am telling you God's eternal truth.

In that day of which I speak, taxes will be a mere nothing. Now, our business men are taxed for everything. City taxes, county taxes, State taxes, United States taxes, stamp taxes, license taxes, manufacturing taxes—taxes, taxes, taxes! Our business men have to make a small fortune every year to pay their taxes. What fastens on our great industries this awful load? Crime, individual and official. We have to pay the board of the villains who are incarcerated in our prisons. We have to take care of the orphans of those who plunged into their graves through sensual indulgences. We have to support the municipal governments, which are vast and expensive just in proportion as the criminal proclivities are vast and tremendous. Who support the almshouses and police stations, and all the machinery of municipal government? The taxpayers.

But in the glorious time of which I speak, grievous taxation will all have ceased. There will be no need of supporting criminals; there will be no criminals. Virtue will have taken the place of vice. There will be no orphan asylums, for parents will be able to leave a competency to their children. There will be no voting of large sums of money for some municipal improvement, which moneys, before they get to the improvements, drop into the pockets of those who voted them. No Oyer and Terminer kept up at vast expense to the people. No empanelling of juries to try theft and arson and murder and slander and blackmail. Better factories. Grand architecture. Finer equipage. Larger fortunes. Richer opulence. Better churches.

In that better time, also, coming to those cities, Christ's churches will be more numerous, and they will be larger, and they will be more devoted to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and they will accomplish greater influences for good. Now, it is often the case that churches are envious of each other, and denominations collide with each other, and even ministers of Christ sometimes forget the bond of brotherhood. But in the time of which I speak, while there will be just as many differences of opinion as there are now, there will be no acerbity, no hypercriticism, no exclusiveness. In our great cities the churches are not to-day large enough to hold more than a fourth of the population. The churches that are built—comparatively few of them are fully occupied. The average attendance in the churches of the United States to-day is not four hundred. Now, in the glorious time of which I speak, there are going to be vast churches, and they are going to be all thronged with worshippers. Oh, what rousing songs they will sing! Oh, what earnest sermons they will preach! Oh, what fervent prayers they will offer! Now, in our time, what is called a fashionable church is a place where a few people, having attended very carefully to their toilet, come and sit down—they do not want to be crowded; they like a whole seat to themselves—and then, if they have any time left from thinking of their store, and from examining the style of the hat in front of them, they sit and listen to a sermon warranted to hit no man's sins, and listen to music which is rendered by a choir warranted to sing tunes that nobody knows! And then after an hour and a half of indolent yawning they go home refreshed. Every man feels better after he has had a sleep!

In many of the Churches of Christ in our day the music is simply a mockery. I have not a cultivated ear, nor a cultivated voice, yet no man can do my singing for me. I have nothing to say against artistic music. The two or five dollars I pay to hear any of the great queens of song are a good investment. But when the people assemble in religious convocation, and the hymn is read, and the angels of God step from their throne to catch the music on their wings, do not let us drive them away by our indifference. I have preached in churches where vast sums of money were employed to keep up the music, and it was as exquisite as any heard on earth, but I thought, at the same time, for all matters practical I would prefer the hearty, outbreathing song of a backwoods Methodist camp-meeting.

Let one of these starveling fancy songs sung in church get up before the throne of God, how would it seem standing amid the great doxologies of the redeemed? Let the finest operatic air that ever went up from the Church of Christ get many hours the start, it will be caught and passed by the hosanna of the Sabbath School children. I know a church where the choir did all the singing, save one Christian man, who, through "perseverance of the saints," went right on, and, afterward, a committee was appointed to wait on him and ask him if he would not please stop singing, as he bothered the choir.

Let these things be done.
Whosoever knoweth his God,
But children of the Heavenly King
Should speak their joys abroad.

"Praise ye the Lord: let everything with breath praise the Lord." In the glorious time coming in our cities, and in the world, hosanna will meet hosanna, and hallelujah, hallelujah.

In that time also of which I speak the haunts of iniquity and crime and squalor will be cleansed and will be eliminated. How is it to be done? You perhaps, by one influence. Perhaps by another. I will tell you what is my idea, and I know I am right in it: the Gospel of the Son of God is the agency that will ever accomplish this.

A gentleman in England had a thought that if the natural forces of wind and sun and sunshine and wave were rightly applied and rightly developed it would make this whole earth a paradise. In a book of great genius, and which rushed from the pen to edition, he said: "Fellow-men, promise to show the means of creating a paradise within ten years, where everything desirable for human life may be supplied by every man in superabundance with labor and without pay—where the face of nature shall be changed into the most beautiful farms, and man may in the most magnificent palaces, in the most refined refinements of luxury, and in the most delightful gardens—where he may accomplish without labor in one year than hitherto could be done in thousands of years. From the houses to be built be afforded the most cultured views can be fancied. From the galleries, the roof, and from the turrets, may be seen gardens as far as the eye can see of fruits and flowers, arranged in the beautiful order, with walks, colonnades, aqueducts, canals, ponds, plains, and theatres, terraces, fountains, sculpture, pavilions, gondolas, places of amusement, to lure the eye and the mind. All this to be done by urging the power of the wind, and the sunshine to their development."

He goes on and gives plates of the machinery by which this work is to be done, and he says he only needs at the start a company in which the shares shall be twenty dollars each, and a hundred or two hundred thousand shall be raised just to make a specimen community, and this being formed, the world will see the practicability, and very soon two or three million dollars can be obtained, and in ten years the whole earth will be emparadised. The plan is not so preposterous as you may have heard of. But I will take no notice of that company! I do not believe that it will ever be done in that way, by any mechanical force, or by any machinery, for the human mind can put into play the power to be done by the Gospel of the Son of God—the omnipotent machinery of grace and pardon and salvation. It is to emparadise the nations. Archimedes destroyed a fleet of ships coming up the harbor. You know how he did it: he lifted a great sun-glass, history tells us, and when the fleet of ships came up the harbor of Syracuse he brought to bear the sun-glass, and he focussed the sun's rays upon those ships. Now the sails are set on fire, the masts fall, the vessels sink. Oh, my friends, by the sun-glass of the Gospel converging the rays of the Sun of Righteousness upon the sins, the wickedness of the world, we will make the world blaze and expire!

In that day of which I speak, do you believe there will be any mid-night carol? Will there be any kicking off from the marble steps of shivering mendicants? Will there be any unwashed, uncombed children? Will there be any phemies in the streets? Will there be any inebriates staggering past? No. No more stores. No lager beer saloons. No billiard-rooms, where they make the three X's. No bloodshot eye. No bloated cheek. No instruments of ruin and destruction. No pin-pointed forehead. The grandchild of that woman who goes down the street with a curse, stoned by the boys that follow her, will be the reformers and philanthropists and the Christian men and the honest merchants of our cities.

Th. what municipal governments, too, have in all the cities. Some cities are less than others, but in many of our cities you just walk down by the city and look in at some of the rooms occupied by politicians, and see to what a loathsome, ignorant, besotted, and y politics is often abandoned. Or they stand around the City Hall picking up scraps, waiting for some emoluments to fall to their feet, waiting all day long, and waiting all night long.

What are those wretched women taken to drunkenness, and carried up to the top and put in prison of course? What do you do with the grogshops that make drink? Nothing. Who are those who are in jail? One of them stole a pair of shoes. That boy stole a dollar. I snatched a purse. All of them are doing society less than twenty dollars. But what will you do with the gambler who last night robbed a young man of a thousand dollars? What shall be done with that which breaks through and destroys the life of a Christian home, and with an endless and perfidy that beats the life of hell, flings a shrieking, shrieking into ruin? Nothing. What will you do with those who fleeced that young man, letting him to purloin large sums of money from his employer—the young man came to an officer of my church and told the story, and frantically asked what should be done? Nothing.

What do we do well to punish small crimes; we have sometimes thought it would be better in some of our cities if the officials only turn out from the jails the criminals, the little offenders, ten-deresadoes, and put in their places the monsters of iniquity who drive a span through the streets so that honest men have to leap to the way of being run over.

What are the damnable schemes that these Christian men will engage in until God the finger of his retribution the collar of their robe of mercy and rips it clear to the bottom! But all these things will be righted. I expect to see the day. I think I see the distance the rumbling of King's chariot. Not alone the minority is the will of God going to be, or the men going to be. The earth are going to be filled with the great populations. Three hundred and sixty bells rang in the air when one prince was killed; but, when righteousness and peace kiss each other on the earth, ten thousand bells shall ring in the jubilee. Poverty ended. Hunger fed. Crime ended. Ignorance enlightened. All the cities saved. Is not this cause worth working in?

Do you think sometimes it does not amount to much! You toil on in your spheres, sometimes with great management. People have no faith. Why? "It does not amount to anything; might as well quit that." Why, when he stretched his hand over the Red Sea it did not seem to mean anything to him. People came out, I suppose, he said, "Aha!" Some of them found that he wanted to do. He wanted to part. It did not amount to anything in this stretching out of his hand over the sea. But, after awhile, the wind blew from the east, and the waters gathered into a glittering pallid on either side, and the billows rear- ing God pulled back on their crystal wheels into line; O, Israel! march! Pearls crashed under feet. Flying rays gathers into rainbow arch of vic-tory the conquerors to march under. The hosts on the beach answering the out of hosts amid sea. And when the host line of Israelites reach the beach, the cymbals clap, and the shields clang, and the waters rush over the pursuers, and the swift-fingered winds on the white keys of the foam play the grand march of Israel delivered and the awful dirge of Egyptian overthrow.

So you and I go forth, and all the people of God go forth, and they stretch forth their hand over the sea, the boiling sea of crime, and sin, and wretchedness. "It don't amount to anything," people say. Don't it? God's winds of help will, after awhile, begin to blow. A path will be cleared for the army of Christian philanthropists. The path will be lined with the treasures of Christian beneficence, and we shall be greeted to the other beach by the clapping of all heaven's cymbals, while those who pursued us, and derided us, and tried to destroy us, will go down under the sea, and all that will be left of them will be cast high and dry upon the beach, the splintered wheel of a chariot, or thrust out from the foam, the breathless nostril of a riderless charger.

A Hindoo Catechist's Work.

Writing from a Madura mission station to the Missionary Herald, Mr. Perkins gives the following testimony to the efficiency of native laborers: "There was a small congregation in an out-of-the-way place, consisting of about twenty-five people, poor, illiterate and superstitious. We had never been able to send them a catechist, and though for some years numbered among us, they were in a very backward state. At the beginning of this year a catechist was placed among them and a little thatched church built. The change to be observed in the congregation now after nearly a year's work is truly remarkable. The congregation has increased to seventy-five; they have abandoned many of their former habits; no work is done on Sundays, and the services are regularly attended. Though unable to read, and with mental life at a low ebb, it was refreshing and most encouraging to the missionary to hear these, perhaps to some, unpromising-looking people repeat Bible verses and relate Bible stories. A still further evidence of their improvement and earnestness is found in the fact that they have endured no little persecution from their Maravar employers, who are irritated with them because they refuse to work on Sunday. 'If you refuse to work in our fields on Sunday, you can keep out of them on other days,' is the order which has been enforced for some months. I do not hesitate to say that the improvement in religious matters and the firmness in adhering to Christian principles are largely the work of an earnest and faithful catechist.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

prejudice was thus created which all the efforts of Protestant missionaries have failed to overcome. Besides this, there was a prejudice against the missionaries themselves. Mexico had been under the dominion of Spain and later under that of France, and she dreaded the influence of foreigners, who might bring her again under a foreign yoke. She was proud, too, and resented the idea of being treated as a heathen land to which the United States was sending missionaries. Against these national prejudices the preachers of the Gospel have had to contend, and the wonder is not that they have had no greater success, but that they have had any success at all.

It was in 1854 that the foundations of really effective religious work in Mexico were laid. Melinda Rankin began in that year to send from her seminary at Brownsville, Tex., Bibles and Christian pupils into Mexico. The Bibles, sent a quarter of a century earlier, had been read and here and there through the country, were men and women who had learned the truth though only dimly and vaguely. For ten years the workers from Brownsville labored secretly and in constant danger from the malignity of the priests, but in 1864 Diaz had laid his strong hand on the clerical persecutors, and it was safe for Melinda Rankin to enter the country herself. She settled at Monterey, and prosecuted her work with vigor. One year later there was an unexpected and valuable accession to the army of Protestants workers. Francisco Aguilar withdrew from the Romish priesthood and began to preach the Gospel in its purity. In 1869, the Rev. Henry C. Riley arrived in Mexico City and commenced preaching under the auspices of the American and Foreign Christian Union. His scholarship and his perfect command of the Spanish language soon attracted large audiences. The Roman Catholic which followed the conversion of Aguas, forty Protestants were murdered. Since then one and another secret murder of prominent preachers has been committed or attempted. But the work has never halted. There are now in Mexico ninety centres of evangelistic work; twelve evangelical denominations are working side by side to spread the doctrines of the Cross; the number of congregations gathered is 615, and of these 444 are regularly organized churches. The number of communicants is estimated at 17,000, but there are many others who have accepted Protestantism, but have not avowed themselves.

It still costs much to be a Christian in Mexico. The missionaries report many cases of social ostracism and tell of young people, who are Christians at heart, who must pay as the cost of public profession the loss of home, fortune, and friends. That so many pay the cost is a testimony to the power of the Gospel.

Rev. D. S. Johnson, writing recently to the "Church at Home and Abroad," says: I venture to give briefly the story of one witness in Mexico, Bernabe, a graduate of the Girls' Normal School, of Saltillo. About three years ago this girl was sent out from the Saltillo school to Moravia, to establish a Protestant school in a district where there were two other schools, a Jesuit and a public school. Nearly all the people were bigoted Catholics. She hired a room, put in some rough benches, and opened her school. Curiosity was excited. Word went to the priests that she was teaching out of a strange book, and when they came to inquire about it, she told them that it was, indeed, a strange book, but a good one, and it had many good stories in it for the children. She did not tell them it was the Bible, and how could they know that it was? for they had never read it. But Bernabe was not a coward. She soon made it known that she was a Protestant. Then they began to persecute her. Six priests appeared in a body and threatened violence unless she gave up the school. She sent a letter to the Governor of the State, telling him the facts, and appealing to him to protect her. He ordered four soldiers to Monclova, who stood guard before the school premises until the priests were overawed.

"At the last annual Mission Meeting in San Luis Potosi, word has come that the authorities of Monclova, where Bernabe had been teaching three years, had determined to abandon both the other schools and unite them with hers, and they offered to pay her the salary of a principal and also that of two assistant teachers whom the missionaries might appoint. Thus everywhere, little by little, the light is getting into Mexico."

The work has been one of difficulty and danger. It has been sealed with the blood of martyrdom. During the excitement

PRaise ye the Lord

Review of the Quarter.

Sunday School Lesson for Sept. 27. Golden Text, Prov. 18: 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"He Rent His Clothes."

THE name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it, and is safe." (Prov. 18: 10.) The Lord's name and our name: how diametrically opposed! Glory belongs to the one; shame to the other. Everlasting victory to one; failure and defeat to the other. Holiness and purity to one; sin and corruption to the other. Life to one; death to the other.

Our lessons for the past quarter have been very largely taken from the life of David, the man who is said to have been after God's own heart. (1. Sam. 13: 14.) From his early years the name of our Lord had been great in the life of David. It was by the direction of the Lord, and therefore in his name, and not by any self-assertion that, after the death of Saul, David went up to Hebron, and the men of Judah anointed him King of Judah. And it was also in the blessed name of the Lord, when the elders of Israel recognized his will concerning David, that he accepted from God through them the kingship over all Israel, for he perceived that the Lord had established him king over Israel, and that he had exalted his kingdom for his people, Israel's sake. (II. Sam. 5: 2, 3, 12.) It is safe to trust in the name of the Lord, and in living out our prayer, "Hallowed be thy name," to leave the care of our name in his hands. By this means, the very honor of God, the certainty that he will be true to himself, is engaged on our behalf.

But that the name of his God might be honored, David, far from seeking to establish his kingdom by strengthening his own cause, and currying favor with his people, made one of the first acts of his reign the bringing up to Jerusalem the ark of God "which is called by the name, even the name of the Lord of hosts that sitteth upon the cherubim" (II. Sam. 6: 2), thus demonstrating to his people that he was a servant of the Lord, to glorify, not himself, but Another, and that other, Jehovah the God of Israel. This was worship.

Thus it was that when David went and sat in his house before the Lord, meditating on his goodness, and considering how he might honor his God, and when he conceived the idea of building the temple, God sent Nathan to him with a message in which he said, "I have made thee a great name like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth." (II. Sam. 7: 9.) God will make a name for those who renounce their name for his, but those who are touchy, captious, sensitive about their own name, what men say and think about themselves, they will soon know them no more, and those whose praise they have coveted and sought will pass away even as themselves.

It was in his jealousy for the honor of God that David showed, not the kindness of his own heart, but the "kindness of God" to Mephibosheth; he dealt with the useless cripple as God had dealt with him, and thus manifested the name of the Lord, "merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression and sin." (Ex. 34: 6, 7.) Again it was in the same holy jealousy for the honor of his God that David, to whom God gave victory after victory over his enemies, attributed none of his success to any military prowess of his own.

And when the man after God's own heart fell into grievous sin, he makes no claim upon God through any of his past obedience and faithfulness. David does not mention one thing in his own favor, he sees that whatever he may have been is all spoiled, and his righteousness cannot be remembered (Ezek. 23: 12, 13), and he falls back utterly on the name, the character, of his God: "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving kindness; according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my transgressions." David was a man who appreciated God, his life in its activity, as well as in the contemplation which we read in his Psalms, was a life of worship, of attributing to God the glory due unto his name: such is a man after his own heart.

In one thing besides his great fall there was a deviation from this clear line of homage to God which ran through his life: it was in regard to his son Absalom. David's earthly affection for his son made him, for the time, disloyal to God. Perhaps there is no temptation so strong for us as parents as to look upon our children as our own. It is this very thing which paralyzes parents in their relations to their children. As long as we accept, in a personal way, either the honor or dishonor which comes to us through our children, we are powerless to bring them to God. Self in us raises a strong barrier between them and God, and we pave the way for a terrible unreality, a religion which exists in them to please us, and which stands between them and real, face to face, knowledge and communion with God. And all this is really idolatry: our children are God's redeemed property, they are no more our own than we ourselves are our own.

But this departure of David's was only temporary, with his whole heart he returned to his God, and his late years were spent in making provision for the building of the temple and in educating his son Solomon to be king in his stead, and to build the house of God. And in the end of his life, with a richer fullness than at the beginning, this man of God, the progenitor and type of the Lord Jesus, poured forth a constant stream of praise to God.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE eleven lessons which fall within the range of this week's review cover the last forty years of David's life. They begin with his accession to the throne of Judah. He is believed to have been at that time thirty years of age. He had passed through a strange preparation for the kingly office. Emerging suddenly from pastoral life, coming from a home in which his father and his elder brothers evidently treated him almost as a child, he enters into the life of a court. Falling under the displeasure of the king he becomes an outlaw, and eventually the captain of a band of outlaws. During some eight or ten years, his life is scarcely worth a day's purchase. This was all the discipline that David underwent to teach him how to reign over a singularly stubborn and sensitive people. It is interesting to observe his success. David brought to his task natural qualities which were of more use than any powers that could have come from education. In those solitary hours in the Bethlehem pastures he had meditated much on God and had formed principles which guided his life, in very different circumstances. A strong, vigorous, prompt man, impatient of injustice and wrongdoing, yet generous and magnanimous, as such men are apt to be, he came to the throne with a consciousness of stewardship and a weighty sense of responsibility. It was remarkable that such a man should have been a poet. But the divine afflatus rested on him in over-mastering power.

His works, even that he could suffer nobly. His last years which were the subject of the last of our eleven lessons, show how close he had walked with God, and how early his wandering heart was turned lovingly to the way he had temporarily deserted. A truly great man, whose power is not found in all secular history. His kingdom was extended and his power of the wars, which were an inevitable traction, developed out of the anomalous condition of its earlier stages, into a settled and civilized national life which progress was continued under Solomon.

THE BROOK KEDRON.

He that ruleth his spirit. (Prov. 12: 1.) In a well-known story, an army of men represented as searching in every corner for one of the enemy whose face he remembered. He wanted to kill him but it had been through his order that his friend he had in the world had life. On every battlefield he looked for that face, resolved to avenge his friend at any cost. The war ceased, peace was proclaimed. His dead mother, traveling for her health, met him by chance. He never forgot the acquaintance of the very man who caused the death of her son. In her the avenger saw and recognized his enemy. Even then he determined to spare him to a duel and kill him himself. Then came the better and more noble feeling. He had a struggle with himself which cost him more than any battle. He won it. He never forgot the man of his enmity and met him on a day of amity. It was a proof of greatness.

Thou wilt compass me about with thine ears. (Ps. 32: 7.) The most cheerful people are not always the people who have the good things of this world. They are the people who have glad hearts and are content with the best of what they have. Two girls were sitting near a brook in the woods. "Listen to that noisy brook!" said one; "it scolds and scolds. I should keep quiet." "Why, sister, it is singing," said the other. "The leaves are falling from the trees. How bare and ugly they look," cried the first speaker. "Oh, but it is so pleasant to gather the leaves," was the reply. "We see more of the blue sky, and the sun shines on us better. The other falls angrily and said, "Your ears are made to be made different from mine. The difference was not in the ears but in the heart. If the heart is right the brook will sing, not scold; the leaves will look blue, and through the bare branches God's love will shine.

Thou hast delivered me from all mine iniquities. (II. Samuel 22: 44.) Sometimes we have attained prosperity for much they owe to God. A man who had been born a poor boy, and whose money had become his idol, was saved by his house and grounds to a Quaker. A genial Friend praised them and said, "The house is wonderfully beautiful. The dollar has done it all," said the mill owner. "What cannot money do?" The Quaker looked sadly at him. He said: "The picture reminds me of the people in Egypt. They bowed down to the golden calf and said it was that which brought them out of Egypt. As it turned out, it brought them and kept them out of the Promised Land. It would be an awful thing if gold kept thee out of heaven. What can't money do?" It can't deliver thy soul."

Prayer's Prevailing Power

The wreck of the Steamer "Moldavia" and her Crew were Rescued—The "Circassia's" Praying Passenger.

Many remarkable instances of answered prayer are recorded in the lives of eminent Christians, and the special providences of the Almighty are demonstrated in such a variety of ways that his children are everywhere encouraged to call upon him and to look for divine aid and guidance in all the emergencies of life. The late Pastor Spurgeon, of England; Dr. Cullis, the eminent American philanthropist; George Muller, founder of the Muller Orphanages, near Bristol, England, and many other Christians widely known, have placed on record their wonderful experiences of answered prayer. Besides, there is a countless multitude of believers, many in the humble walks of life, who testify to the prevailing power of prayer in their own range of experience and while ever ready to bow to the will of the Lord in all things, feel that they have been moved by the Spirit to plead for any blessing which God is disposed ultimately to grant. Miscellaneous records are crowded with the narratives of prayer answered in the crises of life when life and death hung in the balance. The past week, an incident which illustrated the prevailing power of prayer, was related to the writer, who was a participant in the events. The 2000-ton steamer Moldavia (Burnside), was proceeding from Carleton Place, Ontario, when she encountered ice-berg on Aug. 19. The weather was foggy, with a slight fog. The berg was in the port bow, and was so extensive that the vessel found it impossible to clear it. The engines were put full speed astern. Minutes later, the ship collided with the berg, and was so damaged that it was found impossible to clear it. The ship was found to be filling rapidly, and the point of sinking. Boats were lowered and provisioned, and the captain and crew put off from the now settling vessel, to the open sea. Shortly after the steamer sank. For between twenty and forty hours, the unprotected vessel, with their living loads, drifted about at the mercy of the wind and waves, in a sea that momentarily threatened to engulf them and with a light fog hanging over the water the greater part of the time obscuring the horizon. But though there was no human help in sight, Capt.

steamship was ploughing her way to these shores. She was the Circassia, commanded by Captain Boothby. When in mid-ocean she encountered very heavy weather with frequent haze and heavy seas, causing considerable delay through loss of speed. The usual daily run was decreased about seventy miles for several days, and there was no sign of the weather abating. Many of the passengers felt the effects of the storm.

One of the Circassia's passengers was a godly woman approaching middle age. For the greater part of her life, she had been engaged in Christian work of a missionary character in New York, and she had long been consecrated to the winning of precious souls for the Master. When the storm began, this lady sought her cabin and she remained below while the rough weather lasted. During that time she felt strangely led to pray for those in peril at sea; not that there was any real danger on the stanch Circassia, but it was as though her heart were drawn out toward some shipwrecked crew whom she had implored the Saviour to aid, even as he stilled the storm on Galilee at the prayer of the disciples. Earnestly she prayed, and as the hours wore on, forgetful of all else, she continued "in fervent prayer," until the subject of her petitions became to her mind a veritable reality. At last the impulse to prayer ceased as suddenly and strangely as it had come, and she felt in her heart that her appeal had been effectual. A great burden was lifted off her mind and with a word of deep thankfulness to him who careth for all his children, she rose from her knees. Feeling bright and refreshed, despite her long vigil, she prepared to go on deck.

On reaching the deck, she stood amazed. The last vestige of storm had disappeared, the blue sky was overhead with a bright sun, and there, now only a score or more yards away, was the shipwrecked crew of her prayers! The answer had come when the burden had lifted. Trembling in every limb, she could only utter in broken syllables, her gratitude to God for this signal deliverance. The Moldavia's crew, in three boats were now under the bows, and soon boats and occupants were hoisted by the davit ropes and pulleys to the deck of the great steamer. All were safe and sound, like Paul and his friends who were wrecked off Melita and who all got safely to land, the apostle's believing prayers for their safety having prevailed. Who shall say that the prayer of that godly woman, and that of the helpless sailor, meeting before the throne, had not been answered by him who has promised to hear the prayers of the righteous?

The photographs on this page were made by Mr. Joseph Byron, a passenger on the Circassia, who kindly placed them at the disposal of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The rescue was a scene of great excitement and joy. All the men in the three boats were worn out. They had given up using the oars and were continually baling out the water to prevent the boats from sinking. Now all were happily safe, even the dog and cat of the Moldavia, both of which were in the boats, being included in the rescue. Sincere prayers were offered for the remarkable deliverance.

Fall Days at Mont-Lawn.

Our Children's Home Still Filled with Tenement Waifs—The Spiritual Work There.

SEPTEMBER, whose cooling breezes have been the signal for the return to town of those multitudes whose means have enabled them to pass the hot summer at mountain resorts or watering places, has thus far brought no cessation to the activities of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. Owing to the unprecedented heat of July and August, which was felt so severely by the tenement children, it was decided to keep the Home open until the latter part of September this year, in order to permit as many little waifs as possible to be benefited by the outing. Up to the first week of the present month, over two thousand tenement children had been sheltered, cared for and instructed at the Home during the present season. This great army of little ones, drawn from almost every nationality and representing every conceivable shade and degree of poverty and hardship, has been brought from dingy tenement homes into the sunshine of Christian love in kindness for a little while; yet in these few months the seed has been sown that will doubtless find blossom and fruitage and Christian character in the coming years. Many were orphans, some were afflicted in various ways, and a few like poor hunch-backed, Maggie C.,—"Little Number Five Thou-

Mont-Lawn, and states that the knowledge that they have brought joy to the darkened lives of some of these poor ones has proved a substantial comfort and a spiritual stimulus as well.

Many very nice packages of clothing have been received by the matron of the Home, and very kind letters accompany them, showing plainly the deep interest the donors take in the little waifs for whom they have prepared them.

Some amusing incidents frequently occur at Mont-Lawn. One day the mother of a couple of the children visited them while in the Home, and at noon-time was so astonished at the order and etiquette observed in the dining-tent that she exclaimed, "Why! me children will learn manners here—I didn't know as how they could be so perlit!"

One day in chapel, when the subject was "Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love," a dear little fellow piped out, "and sisterly love, too." It often proves entertaining to listen to little conversations and discussions these children have among themselves when they think no one is noticing. Going up the Hudson son one afternoon a little girl said to another, "Who put all this water here?" "Why, God did," promptly responded the other. They were leaning over the rail, and as some of the spray dashed in their faces, this little questioner continued: "How did the salt get into it?" and the other replied, rather hesitatingly this time, "God spilled it in, I think."

When a thunder-storm occurred one evening lately, the little girls at the "Annex," knowing that one of their care-takers had gone to the city that day, and that she must be then upon her way home, became quite alarmed for her safety, and one of them suggested that they should all pray for her, and when she walked in safe and sound a few moments later, she was greeted with a small chorus of "Teacher, we prayed for you!"

Among the letters received from our children—those of them who can write—after they have left Mont-Lawn and resumed their old life in the city, are some that demonstrate that the influence of Christian teaching and example has not been lost. One little lad, writing to a care-taker, says:

Please send me all the verses of "A little talk with Jesus makes it right, all right," as my father likes it.

A copy of the beautiful hymn has been sent to the boy, as he requests.

We trust that all of our readers who are interested in this far-reaching, benevolent work will aid it to the extent of their ability before the close of the present month. The increased expenditures render this appeal necessary. It is for the sake of the children, who can make no plea for themselves, that we ask our friends to remember them. We wish no child to go back to the city shoeless or ragged this year, if it can be prevented.

OUR MAIL-BAG

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

OUR readers will please take notice that the World-Wide Encyclopedia Offer will positively be withdrawn some time this month, just when, it is impossible to say at the time of this writing, but it now looks as though we shall not be able to fill orders very much longer. It would be a wise precaution on the part of such of our friends as contemplate availing themselves of the offer to write us immediately of their intention, that we may arrange to hold a set subject to their order until the end of the month.

G. R. C., Hollidaysburg. Can you tell us the name of the man who saw Abraham hanging by the head from the oak and told Jacob?

The man was one of David's soldiers, probably a spearman, but his name is nowhere recorded.

Va. L. D., Portland, Me. 1. Were there three walls around Jerusalem, one outer to the others, built at different periods and by different persons, and if so, were they consecrated and how broad on top? 2. How many miles was Nazareth from Jerusalem? 3. Was the route over the city wall which Joseph and Mary took? 4. What was the name of the caravan which was by which they traveled? 5. What is a burrow and how propelled?

1. There have been three great historic walls, the first or "old wall," with sixty towers, is described by Josephus; the second or "middle wall" is also described by the historian in his "Wars of the Jews" and the third or "outer wall" begun by Herod Agrippa about A.D. 43. The fourth or present city wall was built by Suleiman the Magnificent, in 1536-42 A.D., as is attested by inscriptions on different gates. The remains of the three former walls as they were thrown down, were used again. The present wall is two and one-half miles in circumference, and from 35 to 40 feet high. 2. It was a "three day's journey" from Jerusalem, a "days' journey" being about 18 miles. 3. There were well-defined roads across plains and through mountain defiles. 4. Asses or camels, probably. 5. A Mexican donkey.

"Baptist Subscriber," Philadelphia, Pa. Is a judgment necessary to go to heaven or hell at death?

We presume God thinks it necessary, otherwise he would not have appointed it. In the case of the righteous, it appears to consist in the apportioning of rewards, and in the case of the wicked there will probably be a difference in the degrees of punishment, which will be fixed at the judgment.

"Perplexed," Detroit, Mich. Is a young man justified by a promise of friendship with a lady after it has continued a year and a half, but without a formal engagement, if on reconciliation with her, he is to marry her, may meet with some one whom he will prefer?

The very fact of your asking such a question implies that an engagement or a marriage would be a mistake. You evidently have not the affection for a lady which is necessary to make the marriage a happy one. But you have acted very improperly in continuing your attentions so long. You may have done her an irreparable injury. The fact should lead you to show the utmost delicacy and consideration in breaking off the friendship. But it is better that the lady bear pain now than to marry you if you cannot give her the love she has a right to expect from her husband.

S. P. N. Y. What were the spiritual gifts referred to in 1 Cor. 12: 13 and 14?

There is no clear description of them, but we infer from the Apostle's letter that they were manifestations of the Holy Spirit's influence, similar, but probably less in degree, to the result of the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. The guarded manner in which Paul writes, suggests the doubt whether he was quite sure that all the manifestations were genuine. He certainly disapproved of the spirit of pride which some of the possessors of the gifts displayed. We gather from his remarks that the gifts were in most cases an increase or intensifying of the natural faculties, but in some instances, the gift of speaking in an unknown tongue.

his greatest love. (See Mark 10: 24.) They are uncontaminated by actual contact with the world, and Christ expressly says: "Except ye become as little children," etc., (see Mark 10: 13-16; Matt. 19: 13-15; Luke 18: 15-17; II. Cor. 12: 14; Eph. 6: 1-4; Col. 3: 20, 21.) As to the angelic destiny of children who die in Christ and the ultimate possibilities mentioned in your question, there is no scriptural data or revelation on which to base a conclusion. 4. We think that it is no dishonor to one who is called to the Lord's work to labor with his head and hands to make a living meanwhile. Indeed, it is always well for the Christian worker to do thus. Paul was a tent-maker and supported himself. There are hundreds of earnest Christians doing effective service, who support themselves and families by secular labor, and thus leave themselves free and the spiritual work unburdened. If the work be blessed of God, it will speedily develop and leave no time for secular employment.

writers describe the ceremony thus: The priest, placing one goat on the right hand and another on the left, took his station by the altar, and cast into the box two pieces of gold exactly similar, one inscribed "for the Lord" and the other "for Azazel" (that term being used to signify the scapegoat). After shaking them he put both hands into the box and took up a lot in each, that in his right hand he put upon the head of the goat on his right and that in his left on the other, and in this manner the fate of each was decided.

Reader, Pello, Ia. Can a person use as a safe guide for a moral or Christian life, to follow strictly the true and honest dictates of one's conscience, or to what extent?

No; while it is true that an active conscience can distinguish infallibly between right and wrong, it is equally true that conscience alone is powerless to guide our lives unless divinely controlled. The sinner's conscience shows him the right and the wrong but he is too weak to embrace the one and avoid the other. Thus sin and the flesh are stronger than conscience, and override its judgment, unless conscience be divinely reinforced. With Christ in the heart, the conscience fulfils its true function as a moral guide. There are lives where conscience has been so dulled and seared and abused as to have become practically inoperative.

In these days of multiplied Christian effort, there are so many good works in hand in different directions, that it is difficult to judge as to their relative deserts. As you probably have a warm interest in boys and girls of your own age, it might be well for you to try to help the faithful Sunday School missionaries in their task of winning the neglected children of the Southwest and West to Christ. Whatever you decide to do, we have no doubt that the Lord will bless, if you do it with your heart.

There is abundant ground for hope in such cases, because the fate of the children rests in the hands of God, who does no injustice and who is love. AFTER a week of sight-seeing in and around New York, during which our distinguished Chinese visitor saw nearly every place of leading interest in the metropolis, entertained many people of note in official life, crossed the big river and paid a flying visit to Brooklyn, Li Hung Chang left his headquarters at the Hotel Waldorf for Washington. He behind him many lively recollections of his metropolitan sojourn. He had hopped with the Mayors of New York and Brooklyn and with high naval, military, and civic dignitaries; he had met the President and had also received a delegation of clergymen from the various missionary boards who presented an address. That address they recalled with gratitude the various edicts and proclamations of the Chinese government for securing safety and well-being of the missionaries. They expressed profound respect for the wisdom and learning of the great Chinese sages, and also for many distinctive features of the Chinese governmental system. They regretted the instances where Chinese immigrants to this country had been rudely treated, and declared the friendly attitude toward them to be one of sincere friendship, pointing to the missions for men and the refuges for Chinese women that have been established here as evidence of the fact. In his reply to this address, Li Hung Chang gave the most favorable assurance of China's friendship for the missionaries, and the desire of his government to protect them and afford them every facility for their educational and religious work in that country. Initially, he had remarked that Confucianism and Christianity agreed on the Golden Rule, that as far as he could discern, "there was very little difference in the two religions." His speech was significant as the most positive demonstration of China's plenteous friendliness toward the missionary cause—a new departure which must bring joy to the hearts of all who are engaged in Gospel work.

In the morning of his departure, a great crowd gathered in front of the Waldorf. Our photographer succeeded in securing a capital portrait of Earl Li at the moment of entering his carriage. He was taken to the Pennsylvania Railroad station, crossed the Hudson on a new and handsome ferry-boat about which he asked a number of curious questions, and boarded a special train of the Pennsylvania railroad. Himself occupying the private car of the Vice-President of the road, in Philadelphia he chatted with William Cramp, the builder of warships, for a few moments. Arrived in Washington, he and his party were escorted to the Arlington, where a suite of rooms was in readiness for their reception. The next morning the Chinese statesmen got early and drove around the city, visited the Capitol and viewing the Senate Chamber and House of Representatives. In the Rotunda, he became deeply interested in the historical paintings. He chatted pleasantly with Librarian Spofford, sat in a Capitol portico and admired the view of the surrounding country, and especially the Washington Monument. He was greatly amused at observing that a contingent of women bicyclists followed him during a part of the forenoon, giving up the chase when Li reached the Chinese Legation two miles out of town, where he took luncheon with Minister Yang, China's representative to this country. Afterward, in company with ex-Secretary Foster, the Viceroy made calls upon the members of the Cabinet now in Washington, and in the evening he attended a banquet given by Mr. Foster in his honor. There was considerable speech-making and Earl Li took occasion to express his gratitude to the American people for their generous reception of himself which he modestly regarded as a compliment to his master, the Emperor. During his remarks he said:

I cannot help, during my brief visit here, to be struck and impressed by the liberty and freedom enjoyed by the people, by the welfare and prosperity in their industrial and commercial pursuits, by the characteristics of their classical, historical, philosophical, and poetical literature, by the manner of application of the scientific discoveries and inventions for promoting the happiness of mankind, and by the display of their artistic taste in the architecture of the public buildings, sculpture, and paintings of historical figures and facts, which my old friend J. W. Foster has been kind enough to show me. These impressions I will carry home, not only as augmentations to my store of knowledge of the fruits of Western modern civilization, but as a means of enlightening the millions I represent, inculcating the introduction of these very means and ends of civilization into China, and amalgamating the oldest civilization of the far East with the most modern of the extreme West.

On the following day, escorted by Secretary Carlisle, Li Hung Chang visited the Treasury Department and inspected the Government's store of cash stowed away in the vaults. The sight of the great wealth in gold, silver and government bonds aroused his keenest interest and brought out many questions concerning financial methods. Altogether the distinguished visitor contrived to crowd into his brief stay at Washington as much sightseeing as could comfortably be arranged and when he departed with his suite for Niagara Falls, took with him a very vivid impression of our "city of magnificent distances." His parting tribute to the American people was thus interpreted:

The three foremost men in history have been Napoleon, the Chinese Emperor Yao and Washington. Napoleon created an empire which was speedily destroyed. Yao created an empire, and then proceeded himself to rule over it. Washington built up a great nation, then stepped aside, leaving others to govern it.

Li has been generous to all who have served him, and wherever he went he invariably left considerable sums of money to be distributed among porters, waiters, and attendants in hotels and elsewhere. To each of the fifty New York Chinese merchants who waited upon him he presented him with a vase and "loving cup," he gave a silver medal. A number of the gentlemen who showed him attention, were surprised at receiving elegant souvenirs of his visit. In fact, nobody seemed to have been overlooked, and the capacious baggage of the great Earl, like the box of the fairy godmother in the fable, contained something for everybody—some little token of his appreciation of their kindness and courtesy.

From Niagara Falls he went to Toronto, thence to North Bay and on to Vancouver by special train on the Canadian Pacific road, sailing for China on the 14th inst. on the steamer Empress of India.

His reception in Canada was a most enthusiastic one, and showed how universal is the appreciation of the great Chinese statesman by the English-speaking peoples of two continents. Those who have been nearest to Li during his visit here, state that to him the most remarkable part of his tour has been his experience in America.

God's Work in New Orleans. What a Band of King's Daughters is Doing for the Neglected Boys.

ONE beautiful May morning just eight years ago, a small band of King's Daughters met in the Tstreet Mission Chapel, in New Orleans, La., and organized the "Mission Reading-Room Circle"; their object being to establish a free reading-room for boys and young men.

New Orleans has a large and active branch of the Y.M.C.A.; but in this, as in every large city, there is a good-sized contingent of the poorest and roughest class, not reached by this excellent institution. It was to reach this class—the boys and men whose whole lives are spent on the street corners and in whose homes the name of God is unknown except as profanity—that the "Mission Reading-Room Circle" was organized.

The Prytania street Presbyterian Church (of which most of the band are members), allowed the use of their mission chapel on T street; and also donated a small organ. A "book social" was held which resulted in one hundred and twenty volumes as a nucleus for a library. Thus, with a pleasant, cheerful room, a small collection of books, and some bright papers and magazines, our work was begun. The rooms were opened every night from six to ten. It was a rough crowd that the workers greeted at first, but they were the very class they desired to reach, and the work of reformation progressed slowly. Yet the occasional news which came to us of "street gangs broken up" in the neighborhood; and from the homes, "my boy is kinder me," made them feel that their labor was not in vain.

After some three years spent in this neighborhood, the mission was moved to 2610 Magazine street. Concerning its later progress Miss Eva D Anderson writes: "We are believers in the 'personal equation' in mission work. On two nights of each week some members of the Circle attend the rooms, spending the entire evening; and by personal talks with the boys strive to show them that we are their friends and desire to help them to live useful and happy lives. They have learned many of the hymns. We have good ular music for them, also, and sometimes make a special evening for them when we can persuade some busy pastor or energetic Christian worker to give them an entertaining and instructive talk, and we always celebrate with them such festive occasions as Christmas and Thanksgiving Day.

During the last year, the record, which is kept nightly, shows an attendance of over 2000 boys and young men, ranging in age from fifteen to twenty-five years. Three hundred books have been taken out from the library. Some of our boys belong to the laboring class, carpenters, painters, longshoremen, etc.; the younger are cash and newsboys; the rest belong to the idle class found in all great cities. Some of these days we hope to have a building of our own, and extend our work, taking in many branches, such as a coffee-kitchen, employment and relief bureaus, gymnasium, etc. Should anyone desire to aid in this work by sending papers, periodicals, or otherwise, it will be appreciated.

Russia's Industrial Show.

For weeks past, the ancient Russian city of Nijni-Novgorod has been a centre of interest for the subjects of the Czar. In July last, the sixteenth Pan-Russian Industrial and Art Exhibition was publicly opened in the quaint old city by the Emperor and Empress in person, amid the clanging of numerous church bells and very general jubilation. Triumphant arches had been erected, and the city, especially in that part of the suburbs known as the "Fair District" (where the annual trade exhibition or fair is held), was generously decorated. General Baranoff, Governor of the district, and a number of other dignitaries and merchants, received the royal visitors. A thanksgiving service was held at the Cathedral of the Transfiguration, and afterward, a special guard, composed of the principal merchants of Nijni and Moscow, awaited their majesties at the Exhibition gates.

Cretan Conflicts.

IS the trouble in Crete amicably adjusted? The best-informed people do not know what to think. The concessions made to the insurgents by the Sultan of Turkey include the removal of the causes of discontent, and on the surface would appear no valid reason continuing the revolution. The Sultan seems to appoint a Christian governor to the island; to organize a foreign police force and to intrust the administration of the island to foreign judges. These changes, if carried out under the supervision of the foreign consuls. Public opinion generally asks what more the Cretans can wish. The Christian government cannot refuse these concessions without putting themselves in the position of appearing unreasonable. But it would not have been better if the Sultan had persisted in his original refusal to reform. Then the revolution would have gone on until it ended either in the annihilation of Crete or its annexation to Greece. When in the spring of 1895 the sixty Christians of Crete met and elected the committee for the liberation of the island they reasonably hoped that the movement would end in complete deliverance of the island from Turkish control. There was no expectation that the Sultan would grant their demands. He did refuse them as expected, and sent a force to suppress the movement. But the Christians determined themselves so valiantly that the Turkish troops were decisively defeated in every battle. The Christians were fighting in the mountain districts where their knowledge of the country compensated for deficiency in numbers. They stood on the defensive and the Sultan was helpless. If he could have pursued the barbarous methods he adopted in Armenia, he could have speedily crushed the insurrection; but he dared not in Crete, with all Europe looking on, as he acted in Armenia. Besides, the Christian people of Greece sympathized with the insurgents and, in spite of the position of the Greek government, he did not wish to embroil himself with his powerful neighbor, they sent assistance in money and arms. Pressure, too, was applied to the Sultan by the foreign powers. He yielded and has practically done all that was asked of him. But never the Christian deputies may do, the people are not disposed to trust the Sultan. They know that when they have shown their arms and are helpless, the Sultan may withdraw his concessions, as he did in Armenia after the Berlin Conference, and perhaps he may choose for doing so, a time when the attention of the European governments is occupied with an absorbing question. The Cretans want to be free, and not to have their liberty dependent on a man who has proved himself utterly vile and unscrupulous and as a demon. They know that it is safe to trust the promises which are made to them, because the Turks are like those of whom the Apostle wrote:

For they promise thee liberty, they themselves are servants of corruption. II. Peter 2: 19.

ful new light and was invited to make a test of it. She submitted her pocket-book to be photographed under the rays, and when the print was handed to her the coins within were clearly shown through the leather. As she counted the discs and compared them with the coins she noticed in the photograph a small black mark. It was too small to be a coin, but it was evidently something more solid than leather. There was nothing in the pocket-book when she emptied it that could have caused the mark in the photograph, but pressing it firmly, something solid was felt. It was something between the leather linings of the pocket-book. When they were separated it was easily found. It was a ruby which had once been in a ring that the lady wore. It had disappeared from the setting some time before and had been carefully sought for, but in vain. Evidently it had dropped from the ring into the pocket-book when she was taking money out of it, and had worked its way between the linings. The gem was valuable and its recovery by the photograph was very any one put his foot on one of the boards it pressed a spring and fired the gun attached to it. He thought that would punish the thief without killing him. His mind was full of business matters as he came home that evening, and he forgot all about the spring-guns. Passing through the grounds he stepped on one of the boards and instantly received the contents of a gun in the calf of his leg. The device was undoubtedly successful, but at the moment he did not feel so much gratification as he did pain. He managed to crawl to the house with some difficulty, and sent a servant for the nearest doctor, who extracted the bullet and bound up the wound. Perhaps now that he has suffered, he may bethink himself that the punishment of shooting was a little out of proportion to the offence of the boys. Men have to learn the philosophy of the Golden Rule sometimes in that way. There seems to be a law of retribution against plotters of mischief, especially against plotters who have not the provocation that this man had. People who plot against the innocent should remember the warning of the Psalmist:

He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made. His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate. (Ps. 7:16.)

The Wine Spoiled.

A lawsuit has attracted public interest in France through the incidental discovery of a scientific fact to which it led. A wealthy retired merchant was the plain-

From Tree to Newspaper.

A scientific journal records an astonishing feat of rapid transformation of material by mechanical process. It states that in order to ascertain the shortest time required to convert the wood of a standing tree into paper, and the latter into a journal ready for delivery, the experiment has been made at Ebenthal by Menzel & Co., paper and wood pulp manufacturers. For this purpose three trees were felled in a near-by forest at 7:35 A.M. and carried to the manufactory, where they were cut into pieces twelve inches in length, these being at once stripped of bark and split, and raised by an elevator to the defibrators of the works. The wood pulp produced by these machines was then put into a vat, where it was mixed with the necessary accompaniments, and, this process finished, the liquid pulp was sent to the paper machine. At 9:34 in the morning the first sheet of paper was finished, the entire manufacture having thus consumed two hours, lacking one minute. The owners of the establishment then took a few of the sheets to the presses of a printing office, and at 10 o'clock a copy of the printed journal was in the hands of the party—only two hours and twenty-five minutes having been consumed in converting the wood of a standing tree into a journal ready for delivery. To an earlier generation it would have seemed incredible that in so short a time a living tree could have been converted into a bearer of news. But the time is to come when moved by the Spirit a better message is to be borne by the trees:

Then shall all the trees of the wood sing out at the presence of the Lord. I. Chron. 16: 34.

A Domestic Volcano.

A press dispatch from Portland, Oregon, reports the thrilling experience of a party of tourists who recently ascended Mount Hood. The mountain is near the northern border of Oregon, about seventy-five miles east of Portland. It is said to be about twelve thousand feet high, and is reputed to be an extinct volcano. The party who made the ascent consisted of twenty-one persons, among whom were several ladies. They spent some time at the summit and were leisurely descending when they came to a crevasse about four feet wide. About half the party had crossed the crevasse when there was a loud, angry roar like distant thunder or the discharge of artillery. The mountain seemed to quiver, and looking up toward the summit, the party saw a column of thick smoke suddenly rise from the towering height above them. A few moments later, the air was thick with a falling torrent of ashes, pebbles and fragments of rock descending from a height. One lady was struck by a large boulder which prostrated her and rolled her into the crevasse. The eruption lasted several minutes, and then all was quiet. One of the guides immediately went to the rescue of the injured lady, stepping carefully down the sides of the crevasse. He found her at the bottom, lying under a heap of stones and quite unconscious. He fastened a rope around her and she was drawn up. She was badly bruised but still alive, and when brought to the surface she recovered consciousness. The party hurried away as quickly as possible, not knowing how soon there might be another eruption. The scene was awe-inspiring in the extreme, and their utter helplessness on the quivering mountain in the midst of that shower of stones made every one afraid. The last scene of this dispensation is to be one of similar but universal panic. Then men will fly in terror to any kind of shelter.

For fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth. Isa. 2: 21.

gratifying to the owner. If the pocket-book had not been brought into the light of the Roentgen rays the precious gem might never have been found. The search for it had been given up as hopeless after all ordinary means of quest had been tried without success, and the lady would in time have reconciled herself to the loss; yet as the event proved, it was not lost beyond recovery. It has been so with many precious souls. Men, judging by the light of reason thought of them as beyond salvation, but in God's light they have been revealed, and he has said of them:

They shall be mine in that day when I make up my jewels. Mal. 3: 17.

Hoist by his own Petard.

A man was caught by his own trap recently in a village on Long Island. He is in business in New York, but spends his leisure time at his home in the village, where he has a beautiful garden. He has been at some pains to cultivate some grapevines, and takes a good deal of pride in the fine grapes he has raised. He has been much annoyed of late by the depredations of the boys who entered the garden at night and carried off the grapes. He put up warning notices and raised the walls, but still he lost his grapes. Finally he resorted to the device of spring-guns. Several guns were placed in the grass at a low angle, and wires were attached to them in connection with small boards, so that if tiff. He testified that he had purchased from a wine merchant a cask of wine, having previously been supplied with samples of various casks, from which to choose the one that suited his palate. The cask was sent to his house and was drawn off and bottled. But when a bottle of it was put on the table, sometime afterward and the merchant drank some of it, he noticed a strange unpleasant taste in it that the sample which he had selected did not have. Other bottles were opened and the wine in each had the disagreeable flavor. He immediately complained to the firm and charged them with sending a different and inferior wine to the one he had chosen. Eventually, he sued them in court and brought some of the wine to be tested at the trial. One bottle of it was handed to a chemist for analysis. He noticed that the bottle was opaque, and he asked for a bottle that had not been used. One was sent to him and he saw that it was transparent. The cause of the change in the wine was at once apparent. The glass in the bottles had lost some of its lime, potash, and soda, which had passed into solution and impregnated the wine. It appears that people who drink wine need to be careful not only as to the quality of the wine, but as to the bottles in which it is contained. A like care is enjoined by the Apostle as to the body, lest its appetites and passions grow uncontrollable, and the soul which should be seeking after God

Wonders of the Yellowstone.

Nature's Fairyland at Our Doors—Scenery Unrivalled by that of Other Lands.

WHEN the wonders of Yellowstone Park are better known," said a traveler to the writer recently, "our people will not be so eager to go abroad to see grandly picturesque scenery.

From Sitka to New Mexico, our whole western possessions are a succession of natural wonders and magnificent surprises. To the north the glaciers and the higher mountain peaks are worth a year's travel to see. But the greatest of all sights is the Yellowstone, whose canon is, I think, the most awe-inspiring and uplifting scene of natural grandeur on earth." This enthusiastic observation might be regarded as exaggerated were it not fairly borne out by all who have ever visited the Yellowstone Park. That great public reservation, once part of the State of Wyoming, belongs to the general Government and is protected and cared for by the nation. One of the finest and most attractive scenes in the Park is the Mammoth Hot Springs (shown in the photograph). These springs, as Dr. Field has recently described them, are the overflow of mineral substances that have been dissolved in the boiling caldron under the earth and forced upward through the fissures of the rocks to be cooled in the upper air. At times the rocks over which their bubbling waters fall seem to glisten with all the colors of the rainbow. The crystallization of the mineral waters thus ejected through long ages, has formed natural terraces of great beauty, similar in many respects to the rocky terraces formed by the great Australian geysers, some of which were visited by Dr. Talmage during his recent tour of the world.

There are a thousand other natural beauties, besides the Hot Springs, to be seen by the visitor to the Yellowstone. Should he be new to the ground, he will need the aid of a guide, for in this vast park—sixty-five miles long by fifty-five wide—it is not a difficult matter to lose one's bearings. He will be constrained to visit the Fountain Geysers—a whole field of bubbling springs. The Lower Geyser Basin is another field for exploration. Such names as "Fountain," "The Great Hill," "Fire-hole River, the Castle, and "Old Faithful," applied to certain springs and localities give some indication of the character of the sights to be witnessed. But the greatest admiration must be reserved for the Grand Canyon—the tremendous gorge among rocky, pine-clad heights between which flows the swift Yellowstone River, rushing to a series of falls that are incomparable, as viewed from the canyon. The scenery is magnificent. A week in this greatest of Parks—it can be pretty thoroughly seen in that time—will be a life-long memory. It is an experience not to be forgotten.

The Real Mary and Her Lamb.

Thousands upon thousands of children have put the questions to puzzled parents: Who was Mary and was there really a little lamb? In a recent issue of the Ladies Home Companion, written by one of the true story of the of famous household poem. On a recent trip, she writes: "I found my neighbor on the steamer to be a Miss Sawyer, a very pleasant, intelligent lady, from Somerville, Massachusetts. In the course of our chats she informed me that she was the niece of Mary, the owner of the pet lamb of school-book fame. The heroine's name was Mary Elizabeth Sawyer. She was born in Sterling, a pretty farming community in Worcester County, Massachusetts, March 22, 1806. When a little mite of a girl, her father, who was a farmer, brought to the house one day a poor little lamb, almost dead. Mary asked her father if she might have it and he gave it to her. She nursed it with such loving care that it soon got well, and became greatly attached to its little nurse, and wanted to be with her and follow her about all the time. And when Mary started to the district school, the lamb could not see why it should not go to school as well as other folks. A young student by the name of Rallstine happened to be visiting the school that day, and the

A little girl was sent to put her bureau drawer in order. She smoothed over the pile of articles, and then carefully spread her nubia over the top. A boy was sent to put the back garden in order. How well it looked from the window when he had finished! Did he think any one would look into the corner behind the woodshed? Alas! for the "heels" of the bureau drawer and garden! Only the parts well done—carefully, conscientiously, honestly done—will ever stand for our credit.

Saying Graceful Things.

There is a nice art in being able to pay a compliment gracefully, and it is one that ought to be cultivated in the home as well as the outer circles of society. There is no reason why the home circle should not be as polished and attractive in its behavior as the public assembly. It is a great error for fathers and mothers to permit such a relaxation of politeness among their children as we too often find under the family roof-tree. Company behavior and company manners may necessarily be more formal and precise than those of the fireside and sitting-room, when there are no strangers present, but it is fatal to good breeding to deliberately lay polish and compliment aside when our own dear ones compose the company exclusively. Teach the children to say graceful things—yet truthful things, of course—to brothers and sisters as well as to strangers; to be as careful of wounding their feelings and their self-respect as they would be of the feelings of a guest, and at the breakfast

You Will Be Sorry Some Day.

MY brother, now groping in blind Refusing to turn to the light; That God in his mercy and kindness Has given to show us the right. No longer neglect his salvation, Or turn from his pleading away, Despise not the great invitation, Or you will be sorry some day.

Delay not, my brother, still thinkin There's plenty of time by-and-by For brother, your soul will be drink The waters that ne'er satisfy. The Water of Life everlasting, That thirst would forever allay, Away from your soul you are castin And you will be sorry some day.

O, turn from the follies alluring, That only were meant to deceive, And you shall have gladness endure If you will on Jesus believe. The strivings of God do not smother Repentantly, earnestly pray; O, get on the Lord's side, my brother, Or you will be sorry some day.

Educate Daughters to Work.

The poorest girls in the world are who have never been brought up to work. There are thousands of them. It is that indulgent parents have petted and they have been taught to despise and to depend upon others for aid and are perfectly helpless. The million women belong to this class. It is the duty of parents to protect their daughters from this deplorable condition. Teach them a great wrong if they neglect their own living.

Every daughter should be taught to earn her own living. Teach her as well as the rich to acquire this training. The rich are likely to come poor, and the poor rich. Skill to labor is no disgrace to the rich, indispensable to the poor. Even we parents should teach their girls to work.

Sand Maps for Children.

Here is an excellent suggestion for entertainment and instruction of children. A mother has provided a sand-box which she made herself, taking about three feet two feet wide, six inches deep, and it with sand; she had heard that a map would be useful in showing the land of the Israelites Sinai, with paper to picture the elements; and the same sand-box be used to make a very accurate map of Palestine, locating Jericho in the desert about crossing the Jordan; also six cities of refuge, and even a road would serve to trace the journey of the Israelites on their way from Egypt to Canaan. On clean, white sand the geographical outlines are easily made, and the geography thus becomes a pleasure instead of a task.

Royal Gardeners.

There are few pleasures so delightful as that of gardening, and some of the most interesting characters the world has ever known have been extremely fond of it. Victoria of England and all her children and grandchildren love to "potter in the garden." The Queen has always made a practice of teaching her children to dig, and to grow flowers, fruit, and vegetables in the garden. Each child was given a separate garden, but each was furnished with the same kinds of flowers and vegetables. There were fourteen beds in each garden, two for flowers, two for strawberries, two for gooseberries, two for currants and two for raspberries—then there was a row each of beets, turnips, potatoes, carrots, asparagus, peas, beans, parsnips, and artichokes. These gardens are kept up exactly the same as the princesses cultivated them year after year.

MAMMOTH HOT SPRINGS, YELLOWSTONE PARK—AN INDIAN GUIDE.

amusing little incident stimulated his poetic genius. A few days afterward, as Mary was leaving the school, he rode up and handed her the first two verses of the poem that has delighted so many little folks, and immortalized Mary and her lamb."

Careless Children.

An evil to be guarded against in childhood is carelessness. One who has had much to do with the training of young children, writes on this subject as follows: It is interesting to go into some room filled with boys and girls, and notice the heels of their boots and shoes. Many of them will be found to be brown and rusty. It is only a careful boy who blacks the heels of his boots. I know a good many persons who think if they can face the world well, appear honest, kind and good, they are doing all that is required. Back out of sight, as they suppose, in the home perhaps, maybe in school or in business, are the little, rude or careless acts that "nobody" sees. Is there nobody to see? What do you suppose the Lord thinks of those unshined moral "heels"? Do they suppose they can go along and never turn around? Do they suppose no one is about to come after them? Just because they are smart enough to see only part, do they suppose no one else will see the whole?

or dinner-table to take just as much pains to entertain and enlighten each other as though the entertainment of a party of invited friends depended upon the effort.

Childish Imitation.

It often happens that the propensity children have for imitation produces a bad result, especially where they are under the direction of persons who are not governed by good moral principles, and who do not restrain themselves before the little ones. But God has given to children this pliability, in order that we may more easily lead them to what is good. Often, without speaking to them, we need only show them in others what we wish them to do, and thus right obedience is readily given and the habit of following a wrong example is discouraged.

Recipe for a Happy Day.

Take a little dash of water, cold,
A little dash of prayer,
A little bit of sunshine gold,
Dissolve the mixture in
A little of your meekness and contentment,
And the right for faith and love,
And then, as a prime ingredient,
A plenty of work throw in.
Flourish with a generous dose
And a little dash of play;
Let your soul be glad and a relapse have Complete the well-spent day.

David's Life.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic of the Week Beginning September 27. Samuel 22 : 1-22.

LESSONS from David's life are many and varied. As with so many of the Bible characters, his career suggests lessons applicable to lives and circumstances widely differing from his own. The following are a few out of the many.

His first appearance in the Bible story suggests the lesson that it is not well to depend on a youth. Samuel would have anointed Jesse's eldest son, but he had been left to his own discretion. Jesse did not think of summoning the boy who was attending to the sheep, until all his other sons had been rejected. Even after anointing, David's brother envied him for appearing in the camp. They could not see a man in the boy as God saw him. Another lesson is that a trusting soul overcomes formidable obstacles. There were many brave men in Saul's army who had not the courage to meet the big Philistine. David had no hesitation in going to fight him, and won because he trusted in God. So now, those who do the best work for God are not usually men of physical prowess, but men who have strong faith in God. A third lesson is that valuable and disinterested service is often appreciated. David received a reward promised to the man who killed Goliath, but because of Saul's jealousy, he was hated of the man he had saved. Nothing but disappointment awaits the man who expects his reward to human nature. A fourth is that it is best to await God's time for the fulfillment of a promise. Although David was anointed and was promised the throne, he would take no measures to win it for himself. Jacob and his mother would not wait for the fulfillment of the promise that the first-born son should serve the younger, but tried to bring it about by fraud. David would not take a step, even when he was urged and had the opportunity, to promote the fulfillment of the promise. He was the man after God's heart. Again: Duty becomes pleasure in the doing. David wished to show kindness to some member of Saul's family to a descendant of the man who had been his most resolute and implacable enemy. It could not have been a pleasant thing to do, but he undertook it as a duty. When the man was found, he proved to be the son of Jonathan, David's best friend, and his duty became a pleasure. To the man who goes on boldly from a sense of right and duty and justice, the way is often opened to unexpected pleasure. Again: Triumph should never lead to self-confidence. The man who had killed the giant and performed mighty deeds of valor, fell before temptation in the form of a woman. A strong became weak when assailed by a tempter in a different guise. Another lesson is that: Heinous sin is forgiven to the penitent. No man need despair of obtaining God's forgiveness if he will approach him in humility, acknowledging his sin, and pleading for pardon. Finally: No man must be judged by isolated acts. It is the general trend of his life that shows his character. We were to judge David by the story of his fall with Bathsheba, we should condemn him as vile and corrupt, unfit for society. Yet how false would such a estimate be! We know him to have been a great and good man whose lapse into sin was a deplorable exception to his ordinary course. The fact should make us merciful in our treatment of a fallen brother. When a Christian commits some crime and brings reproach on the name of Christ, we are not to condemn it, treat it lightly; but neither on the other hand are we to assume that the man is a hypocrite who must be repudiated.

ART sad? The friendly willow droops
 Its gentle head and weeps.
 Art glad? The sunbeam, smiling, stoops
 To wake the bud that sleeps.
 Look up; the blue of heaven is ours,
 Its crimson and its gold.
 Look down, and drink from wayside flow'rs
 The love their dewcups hold.

The Father-care, that wraps us 'round
 With watchful tenderness,
 In shade or shine is always found—
 His love and nothing less.

THY WILL BE DONE.

HE sendeth sun, he sendeth shower,
 Alike they're needful for the flower;
 And joys and tears alike are sent
 To give the soul fit nourishment:
 As comes to me or cloud or sun,
 Father, thy will, not mine, be done!

Can loving children e'er reprove
 With murmurs whom they trust and love?
 Creator, I would ever be
 A trusting, loving child to thee:
 As comes to me or cloud or sun,
 Father, thy will, not mine, be done!

Oh, ne'er will I at life repine;
 Enough that thou hast made it mine;
 When falls the shadow cold of death,
 I yet will sing with parting breath:
 As comes to me or shade or sun,
 Father, thy will, not mine, be done!

TRUST.

I KNOW not if or dark or bright
 Shall be my lot;
 If that wherein my hopes delight
 Be best or not.

My bark is wafted to the strand,
 By breath divine,—
 And on the helm there rests a Hand
 Other than mine.

One who has known in storms to sail,
 I have on board;
 Above the raving of the gale
 I have my Lord.

He holds me when the billows smite,—
 I shall not fall.
 If sharp, 't is short,—if long, 't is light,—
 He tempers all.

Safe to the land, safe to the land!
 The end is this:—
 And then with him go hand in hand Far into bliss!

—HENRY ALFORD.

DIVINE LOVE.

I LOVE my God, but with no love of mine,
 For I have none to give;
 I love thee, Lord, but all the love is thine.
 For by thy life I live.
 I am as nothing, and rejoice to be Emptied and lost and swallowed up in thee.

Thou, Lord, alone art all thy children need,
 And there is none beside;
 From thee the streams of blessedness proceed;
 In thee the blest abide,
 Fountain of life, and all-abounding grace,
 Our source, our centre, and our dwelling-place!

The Prophetic Parables.

The Era of the Fulfilment of the Parable of the Mustard Seed.

THE third of the seven prophetic parables is that of the mustard tree. The mustard seed was proverbial in Palestine as the smallest of familiar seeds. It is sown by a man in his field; and, with a solemn significance, the Lord tells us that this plant, although really belonging to the class of pot-herbs, or garden vegetables, grows, nevertheless, into a tall tree. In becoming a tree the mustard throws out great branches, so that the fowls of the air, which in the first Parable caught up and devoured the good seed, are able to come and lodge under its shelter.

The grain represented the principles of the Church as sown by Christ in the world; the description of its unnatural growth signified that those principles would be abandoned as the age rolled on—a prediction which was very manifestly fulfilled.

For the Lord charged his disciples to learn of him, and be meek and lowly in heart during their sojourn upon earth; to cast aside every high thought, and follow their despised and rejected Master. But Satan, by means of false teachers and errors stealthily introduced during the period of the tares, prevailed on the great body of professing Christians to turn from the words of golden hope, "Behold, I come quickly"—inscribed, as it were, by the Lord upon the blue veil of heaven through which he ascended—and to fix their eyes upon earthly things. He taught them to think of the cessation of human enmity, and of their own growing importance; and so allured their community in the direction of an eminence to which they could attain only by forsaking Christ and serving Mammon. Then, when the fitting moment had arrived, he approached them, and offered the present favor of earthly kings in exchange for the hope of the Kingdom of heaven. And, forgetful of their Lord's example, they accepted the offer: like Eve, they were beguiled, and blindly consented to receive their power and influence from the Prince of this World.

The phase represented in the Parable began to be developed in the early part of the fourth century, when Constantine was carried to the imperial throne upon the shoulders of his British legionaries, the great majority of whom were Christians, and a nominal Christianity became the state religion of the Roman Empire.

Now it has been a frequent custom of the polytheistic Romans to acknowledge all the gods, while they selected one of them as a special patron and object of adoration. And, accordingly, Constantine, in deference to the feelings of his soldiers, placed Christ in the Pantheon, and adopted him as his favorite God; though, at the same time, he continued to worship the heathen deities, giving the preference to Apollo. His religion was dictated by motives of policy, and his desire was to weld his Christian and Pagan subjects into one people. To promote this end he introduced the Mystic Tau and other sensual Pagan symbols to which he gave Christian spiritual meanings.

The confusing and corrupting effects of Constantine's policy may be easily imagined: Christianity was transformed into a kind of Paganism with new names, and the world ceased to view it with disfavor. And, meanwhile, the private conduct of the emperor, inasmuch as it had to be condoned by the Church, must have greatly contributed to laxity of morals. This caused his enemies to say that he had become a Christian because no other religion offered pardon for such atrocities as he chose to commit.

H., that a gifted friend may give his heart to Christ and become a humble follower of the Saviour; also that an only son may be brought into the fold of Christ.—Lover of Peace, Herkimer, N. Y., for the conversion of one who has received much love and kindness but has given only ingratitude and misery in return, that she may see the error of her ways and seek a new heart from the Lord and henceforth live in peace with those with whom she is at enmity.—Believer, South Henderson, Ill., for the conversion of two brothers and a friend.—Anxious Mother, Phila., that God in his mercy would save her boy, who was consecrated to God from his birth, but who seems to give himself up to sin.—"Sister," Brooklyn, for the conversion of her brother.—F. E. A., Mobile, Ala., that her husband, who has fallen into grievous sin, may be reclaimed and brought to Christ.—"Anxious Mother," Knoxville, Tenn., that her son, who has imbibed infidel sentiments, may be led to believe in God and look to Christ for salvation.—K. B. B., for the thorough conversion of two sons and her brother, that all of them might seek Christ with true penitence of heart.—Reader, Rome, Wis., for the conversion of her husband, who is addicted to drink and is very profane, that Christ, who saved Paul, the persecutor, may save this man.—Anxious Mother, Margaretville, for the conversion of her son and that he may be useful in Christ's service.—"Trusting One," Ill., that a beloved friend may realize his lost condition and turn to Christ for salvation and give their hearts to him.—Subscriber, Sangatuck, Mich., that a talented friend who is very wild and wayward may give his heart to God and be saved from his sins through Christ.—Anxious Mother, Lind, Wis., that her husband and children might be brought to Christ and that the Lord's work may be revived in an ungodly neighborhood.

For the Restoration of Health. Trusting One, New York, asks prayer that a dear nephew who is prostrated with lung trouble may recover.—J. B., Decatur, Ill., that a beloved son who is far from home and is very ill, may be healed and raised up in his wonted health.—Constant Reader, Gratz, Pa., for the recovery of failing eyesight.—Believer, Maitland, Pa., for the recovery of an aged lady who has been helpless for ten years with chronic rheumatism.—C. S. R., Providence, R. I., that a dear, kind son may be healed of a painful disease.—S. W. H., Vantura, Cal., that her husband who has been a sufferer for four years past, may recover.

For Special Blessings. Believer, Indiana, that if it be the Lord's will some small provision might be made for an aged couple so that they may not be separated in their declining years.—L. A. T., Kiota, Iowa, for help in passing a difficult examination and for wisdom to see the right course to take in life and for guidance in all things.—J. G. V., Fort Wayne, Ind., on behalf of a young man who through the stringency of the times has lost his situation. He has two young children to whom he is tenderly attached and whose welfare is the object now of sad concern. He begs prayer that in some way he may succeed in obtaining employment so that those dependent upon him may be provided for.—H. L. M., Baltimore, Md., that two dear brothers whose present whereabouts are unknown to their family, may be brought back in peace and in the love of God.—Wife and Mother, Hull, Mass., that a way may be opened out of various difficulties and the means be provided for the payment of debts.—Invalid, Long Branch, N. J., that one who has a besetting sin which she cannot overcome of herself may receive strength from Christ sufficient to her need.—Troubled One, Claremont, N. H., that God would forgive some very grievous sins, remove present temptations and cause the one who is tenderly loved to return.—One who believes, Hancock, Iowa, for grace to live a consistent Christian life in very untoward surroundings, and for wisdom to train a family of children in the Lord's way, and that help may be given for the settlement of pressing financial difficulties.

A Convert's Trials.

In many countries there is a significance in Christ's promise to those who give up father, mother, wife and children and property for his sake, that is not perceived in Christian lands. Dr. Jones, of Pasmalai, in India, reports in a recent letter a case in point. He says: "In a remote village, where nearly all the people live by robbery, the seed sown by itinerant preachers found a lodging in the mind and heart of one of the leading men of the village. After some thought and hesitancy he decided, three years ago, to profess Christ openly. This was the cause of an immediate outburst of persecution. It was claimed that the presiding god of his caste would not tolerate such an apostasy; that he would, therefore, pour his vengeance upon the whole village. It is no wonder therefore that all means, fair and foul, were used to compel this new brother and his good and equally firm wife to return to the worship of idols. First his brothers showed the most bitter opposition, and the oldest was almost beside himself with rage. The village brought its many means of caste tyranny to bear upon the convert. His home was threatened with fire, and as an earnest of this menace his stack of straw, worth forty-five rupees, was burned to the ground. The family was banned and shunned. But nothing could shake them in their Christian purpose and in their new-found life in Christ. Their meekness, patience and boldness under all were not without effect upon the community. The influence was seen first among their immediate relatives. The brothers one by one relented and became friendly, and are now in turn being persecuted because of their tolerance of and kindness to him. A few earnest inquirers are found in the village, and about twenty of the young men have taken the first and important step of protest against heathenism by ceasing to rub the sacred ashes. Some are sending their boys with our new convert's sons to our boarding school for Christian training; and a substantial prayer house is being erected there at considerable expense, the largest part of which is met in the village itself. There is every prospect that in a short time the Christian congregation of that village will become a large and prosperous one."

Little Evengels.*

YOUNG lady was preparing for a dancing party, and standing before a large mirror placed a light crown, adorned with silver stars, upon her head. While thus standing, a little fairy entered, climbed into a chair, and put her fingers to examine this beautiful dress, and was accosted thus, "What are you doing? You should not touch that crown!" Said the little girl, "I was only looking at that, and not of something else." "Tell me, what are you thinking about—you, a little girl?" "I was remembering that my school teacher said, that if we were chosen by our influence we should go for our crown in heaven; and I saw those stars in your crown, I thought I could save some soul." The little girl went to the dance, but in solemn words of the innocent child lodged in her heart, and she enjoyed the association of her friends. At an early hour she left the hall, and returned to her home, and going to her room where her dear little sister lay, she imprinted a kiss upon her forehead, and said, "Precious sister, you are one star for your crown," and that the bedside offered a fervent prayer for God for mercy.

Just ago the mayor of a town concluded in Christ, and told the people the story of how he was awakened from his only little boy. Just as the dear child died, he looked up so earnestly—"Up! up!" His thought he meant that he wanted to go up-stairs, and said, "Yes, Willie, carry you up-stairs." "No," he said, "higher, higher; Papa don't let me go; let Mamma come." He said, that his little boy was dying, and stood one side while the mother held him in her arms and prayed for him. He said the thought that in the face of death he could not pray with his boy, and the words, "Papa, don't let me go," led him to resolve to seek God.

And he represents the man who is blinded by it to the reality of heaven. Our country has thousands of such men of them was dying not long ago. He told his little daughter how dreadfully he felt because he must die. She said to him: "Why, Papa, you have a home in the city; and a beautiful home in the mountains; and a beautiful home in Florida; and a beautiful home in the sea. Haven't you a beautiful home in Heaven, Papa?" He was obliged to say that he knew that he could not force himself into heaven. He comes as far as he can, and you know that he is there and he has come for, and then you must look the bolt, and turn the key, and open the door, and say "Come in."

Of a little girl whose mother gave her a pretty card with this verse, and with a picture upon it. She was deeply interested in the explanation her mother gave it, and took her card to bed. The next morning she said to her mother, "Mamma, I lay awake a good while after you had heard me say my prayer, thinking of Jesus outside the door. And Mamma, I prayed him, O, so that he would come into my room and stay there always! and Mamma, I believe he has come in, and I am going to his little girl." Now this is just what that people, whether big people or little people, have to do. They must let Jesus come in, and invite him to come in, and he has said, if they do this, he will come in.

PULE AND MORPHINE "HABITS." By a friend who uses Opium or Morphine, and has been cured. My treatment is radically different from the usual treatment; contains no opiate or other narcotic; retards, without suffering. Free trial; if not cured, cost you nothing. Carlos Bruisard, M. D., 1231 Broadway, Cincinnati, Ohio.

I once read of a boy who had a remarkable dream. He thought that the richest man in town came to him and said, "I am tired of my house and grounds. Come and take care of them, and I will give them to you." Then came an honored judge, and said, "I want you to take my place. I am weary of being in court day after day. I will give you my seat on the bench if you will do my work." Then the doctor proposed that he take his extensive practice and let him rest, and so on. At last up shambled Old Tommy, and said, "I'm wanted to fill a drunkard's grave. I have come to see if you will take my place in these saloons and on these streets."

This is a dream that is not all a dream. For every boy in this land to-day who lives to grow up, some position is waiting, as surely as if rich man, doctor, or drunkard stood ready to hand over his place at once. Which will you choose, boys?

The Gothenburg System.*

THE Gothenburg system prevails largely in Sweden and Norway, and takes its name from a city in the former country, where it was introduced in 1765. Briefly stated, the Gothenburg system places the retail and bar traffic in spirituous liquors in the hands of private corporations, which conduct the traffic under regulations intended to discourage consumption. All profits arising from the traffic except a fixed moderate interest—usually six per cent. upon the capital invested—are devoted to public or philanthropic purposes. The six per cent. interest on capital invested goes to the company conducting the traffic. The traffic in beer and wine is not generally monopolized, but is conducted largely, as in this country, under individual licenses; but every company license to sell spirituous liquors carries with it the right to sell the lighter drinks.

The Gothenburg system is coupled with Local Option. The people of each town, city, village, or country district are empowered through their representative, to adopt the company or Gothenburg system, the system of individual licenses, or no license. The wholesale traffic in beer and spirituous liquors does not, as a rule, come under the above-named restrictions. The Governor is the nominal head of the license system, giving his assent or refusal to each application for license; but he rarely, if ever, interferes with the decision of the authorities in particular localities, nor can he grant licenses where a locality has decided against license.

Dr. E. R. L. Gould, in his special report to the United States Commissioner of Labor on the Gothenburg system, says: "The company system bids fair to prevail wholly both in Sweden and Norway. Thirteen towns, mostly small, still dispose of licenses at auction. In two villages, no spirits are sold either at retail or over the bar. In country districts, prohibition practically prevails."

Devoted Missionaries at Mont-Lawn and their Spiritual Work Among the Waifs—Singing Days at Our Children's Home—An Outing for Little Mothers and Babies.

SEPTEMBER'S golden days will soon be ended, and "the turning of the leaves" has already begun in the woods about Mont-Lawn. Our Children's Home, which has been a scene of the liveliest activity during the summer, will be closed and the last party of little guests will be back among the tall tenements and narrow courts of the big city. Each summer witnessed an increase in the number of children received at home, and year after year the number increased, and last year the number reached 2,300. It and have become very dear to the children, indeed. Besides the routine work of the Home, which was admirably done, they gave many hours, lovingly and patiently, each day, to the care and entertainment of the little folks, and entered into all their childish pleasures and occupations with the zest of sisters, sharing their joys comforting them in their sorrows, nursing the weak and sickly ones and bringing back color to their faded little faces. Under their training, rough youngsters became better behaved and the rowdy gamins of the slums forgot for a time their rudeness, and tried hard to be better "for teacher's sake." It was their hands, too, that folded the rebellious little fingers in prayer at night-fall, and their lips that taught the hushed and bowed little white-robed waifs to say, "Our Father" and "Now I lay me"—unfamiliar, alas! to many. And so it was every day, from dawn till after sunset, whether at prayer or praise in the little chapel, romping on the lawn, dining in the big marquee tent, or flower-gathering in the woods—the same constant, conscientious service was rendered, looking both to the bodily and spiritual welfare of the little charges. There are abundant evidences that the loving labors of the missionaries have influenced many of those childish hearts and lives in a way that will outlast all the memories of Mont-Lawn and its pleasant companionships.

Our group of portraits in this issue is therefore one which we feel assured will interest a very considerable number of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Miss Helen Collins, the Matron, or "House-Mother," as our children lovingly call her, is a native of Brooklyn. She has been engaged in missionary work during the last five years, and had a two years' training course in the Christian Alliance College. Miss Collins was actively identi-

A Rapturous Outlook.

on the Text: Rom. 13: 12.

BACK from the mountains and the seaside, and the springs, and the farmhouse, your cheeks bronzed and your spirits lighted, I hail you home again with the words of Gehazi to the Shunammite: "Is it well with thee? is it well with thy husband? is it well with the child?" On some faces I see the mark of recent grief, but all along the track of tears I see the story of resurrection and reunion when all tears are done; the deep ploughing of the keel, followed by the flash of the phosphorescence. Now that I have asked you in regard to your welfare, you naturally ask how I am. Very well, thank you. Whether it was the bracing air of the mountains, or a bath in the surf of Long Island beach, or whether it is the joy of standing in this great group of warm-hearted friends, or whether it is a new appreciation of the goodness of God, I cannot tell. I simply know I am happy. It was said that John Moffatt, the great Methodist preacher, occasionally got fast in his sermon, and to extricate himself would cry "Hallelujah!" I am in no such predicament to-day, but I am full of the same rhapsodic ejaculation. Starting out this morning on a new ecclesiastical year, I want to give you the keynote of my next twelve months' ministry. I want to set it to the tunes of "Antioch," "Ariel," and "Coronation." I want to put a new trumpet stop into my sermons. We do wrong if we allow our personal sorrows to interfere with the glorious fact that the kingdom is coming. We are wicked if we allow apprehension of national disaster to put down our faith in God and in the mission of our American people. The God who hath been on the side of this nation since the 4th of July, 1776, will see to it that this nation shall not commit suicide on November 3d, 1896. By the time the unparalleled harvests of this summer get down to the sea-board, we shall be standing in a sunburst of national prosperity that will paralyze the pessimists who by their evil prophecies are blaspheming the God who hath blest this nation as he hath blest no other.

In all our Christian work you and I want more of the element of gladness. No man had a right to say that Christ never laughed. Do you suppose that he was glum at the wedding in Cana of Galilee? Do you suppose that Christ was unresponsive when the children clambered over his knee and shoulder at his own invitation? Do you suppose that the Evangelist meant nothing when he said of Christ: "He rejoiced in spirit?" Do you believe that the Divine Christ who pours all the waters over the rocks at Vernal Falls, Yosemite, does not believe in the sparkle and gullo and tumultuous joy and rushing rapids of human life? I believe not only that the morning laughs, and that the mountains laugh, and that the seas laugh, and that the cascades laugh, but that Christ laughed. Moreover, take a laugh and a tear into an alembic, and assay them, and you will find as much of the pure gold of religion in a laugh as in a tear. Deep illumination. John Wesley said he was sure of a good religious impression being produced because of what he calls the great gladness he saw among the people. Godless merriment is blasphemy anywhere, but expression of Christian joy is appropriate everywhere.

Moreover, the outlook of the world ought to stir us to gladness. Astronomers disturbed many people by telling them that there was danger of stellar collision. We were told by these astronomers that there are worlds coming very near together, and that we shall have plagues and wars and tumults and perhaps the world's destruction. Do not be scared. If you have ever stood at a railroad centre, where ten or twenty or thirty rail tracks cross each other, and seen that by the movement of the switch one or two inches, the train shoots this way and that, without colliding, then you may understand how fifty worlds may come within an inch of disaster, and that inch be as good as a million miles. If a human switch-tender can shoot the trains this way and that without harm, cannot the hand that for thousands of years has upheld the universe, keep our little world out of harm's way? Christian geologists tell us that this world was millions of years in building. Well, now, I do not think God would take millions of years to build a house which was to last only six thousand years. There is nothing in the world or outside the world, terrestrial or astronomical, to excite dismay. I wish that some stout Gospel breeze might scatter all the malaria of human foreboding. The sun rose this morning at about six o'clock, and I think that is just about the hour in the world's history. "The day is at hand."

The first ray of the dawn I see in the gradual substitution of diplomatic skill for human butchery. Within the last twenty-five years there have been international differences which would have brought a shock of arms in any other day, but which were peacefully adjusted, the pen taking the place of the sword. The Venezuelan controversy in any other age of the world would have brought shock of arms, but now is being so quietly adjusted that no one knows just how it is being settled.

The Alabama question in any other age of the world would have caused war between the United States and England. How was it settled? By men-of-war off the Narrows, or off the Mersey? By the gulf stream of the ocean crossed by a gulf stream of human blood! By the pathway of nations incarnadined? No. A few wise men go into a quiet room at Geneva, talk the matter over, and telegraph to Washington and to London, "All settled." Peace! Peace! England pays to the United States the amount awarded—pays really more than she ought to have paid. But still, all that Alabama broil is settled—settled forever. Arbitration instead of battle.

So, the quarrel about the Canadian fisheries in any other age would have caused war between the United States and England. England said, "Pay me for the invasion of my Canadian fisheries." The United States said, "I will not pay anything." Well, the two nations say, "I guess we had better leave the whole matter to a commission." The commission is appointed, and the commission examines the affair, and the commission reports, and pay we ought, pay we must, pay we do. Not a pound of powder burned, no one hurt so much as by the scratch of a pin. Arbitration instead of battle.

So the same controversy in any other age would have brought Germany and the United States into bloody collision. But all is settled. Arbitration instead of battle.

France will never again, I think, through the peccadillo of an ambassador, bring on a battle with other nations. She sees that God, in punishment at Sedan, blotted out the French empire, and the only aspirant for that throne who had any right of expectation dies in a war that has not even the dignity of being respectable. What is the leaf that England would like to tear out of her history? The Zulu war. Down with the sword and up with the treaty.

We in this country might better have settled our sectional difficulties by arbitration than by the trial of the sword. Philanthropy said to the North: "Pay down a certain amount of money for the purchase of the slaves, and let all those born after a certain time be born free." Philanthropy at the same time said to the South: "You sell the slaves, and get rid of this great national contest and trouble." The North replied: "I won't pay a cent." The South replied: "I won't sell." War! War! A million dead men, and a national debt which which might have ground this nation to powder. Why did we not let William H. Seward, of New York, and Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, go out and spend a few days under the trees on the banks of the Potomac and talk the matter over and settle it, as settle it they could, rather than the North pay in cost of war four billion seven hundred million dollars, and the South pay four billion seven hundred and fifty million dollars, the destroying angel leaving the first-born dead in so many houses all the way from the Penobscot to the Alabama. Ye aged men whose sons fell in the strife, do you not think that would have been better? Oh, yes! we have come to believe, I think, in this country, that arbitration is better than battle.

I may be mistaken, but I hope that the last war between Christian nations is ended. Barbarians may mix their war-paint, and Chinese and Japanese go into wholesale massacres, and Afghan and Zulu hurl poisoned arrows, but I think Christian nations have gradually learned that war is disaster to victor as well as vanquished, and that almost anything bought by blood is bought at too dear a price. I wish to God this nation might be a model of willingness for arbitration. No need of killing another Indian. No need of sacrificing any more brave General Custers. Stop exasperating the red man, and there will be no more arrows shot out from the ambushments. A general of the United States Army in high repute throughout this land, and who, perhaps, had been in more Indian wars than any other officer, and who had been wounded again and again in behalf of our Government in battle against the Indians, told me that all the wars that had ever occurred between Indians and white men had been provoked by white men, and that there was no exception to the rule. While we are arbitrating with Christian nations, let us toward barbarians carry ourselves in a manner unprovocative of contest.

Let me put myself in their place: I inherit a large estate, and the waters are rich with fish, and the woods are songful with birds, and my cornfields are silken and golden. Here is my sister's grave. Out yonder, under the large tree, my father died. An invader comes, and proposes to drive me off and take possession of my property. He crowds me back, he crowds me on, and crowds me into a closer corner, until, after awhile I say: "Stand back, don't crowd me any more, or I'll strike. What right have you to come here and drive me off my premises? I got this farm from my father and he got it from his father. What right have you to come here and molest me?" You blandly say: "Oh, I know more than you do. I belong to a higher civilization. I cut my hair shorter than you do. I could put this ground to a great deal better use than you do." And you keep crowding me back and crowding me on into a closer corner and closer corner, until one day I look around upon my suffering family, and fired by the hardships I hew you in twain. Forth all the world comes to your funeral to pronounce eulogium, comes to my execution to anathematize me. You are the he am the culprit. Behold the United States Government and the North American Indian. The red man has stood more wrong than I would, or you. We would be struck sooner, deeper. That which is in defence of a Washington home is in defence of a home on top of the Nevada. Before this dwindling red dies completely out, I wish that this era might by common justice atone the inhumanity of its predecessors. In day of God's judgment, I would rather a blood-smear Modoc than a swine United States officer on an Indian reservation! One was a barbarian and a savage and never pretended to be anything but barbarian and a savage. The other pretended to be a representative of a Christian nation. Notwithstanding all this, the eral disgust with war and the substitute of diplomatic skill for the glittering of keen steel is a sign unmistakable "the day is at hand."

I find another ray of dawn in the expression of the world's distances. V a slow, snail-like, almost impossible it would have been the world's rectitude with fourteen hundred millions of population and no facile means of communication; but now, through telegraphy for eye and telephonic intimacy for the and through steamboating and railroad the twenty-five thousand miles of world's circumference are shriveling up to insignificant brevity! Hong Kong nearer to New York than a few years New Haven was; Bombay, Moscow, dras, Melbourne within speaking distance. Purchase a telegraphic chart, and by blue lines see the telegraphs of the and by the red lines the cables under the ocean. You see what opportunity there is going to give for the final movement Christianity. A fortress may be more or years in building, but after it is constructed it may do all its work in two minutes. Christianity has been placing its batteries for nineteen centuries, may go on in the work through other centuries; but when those batteries are roughly planted, those fortresses are built, they may all do their work in twenty-four hours. The world sometimes rides the church for slowness of movement. Is science any quicker? Did it not science five thousand six hundred fifty-two years to find out so simple thing as the circulation of the human blood? With the earth and the sky of electricity, science took five thousand eight hundred years before it even guessed that there was any practical use might be made of this subtle and mysterious element. When good men take possession of all these scientific forces, and these agencies of invention, I do not know that the redemption of the world will be more than the work of half a day. Do not read the Queen's speech at the opening of Parliament the day before London? If that be so, is it any marvellous to believe that in twenty-four hours a Divine communication can reach the whole earth? Suppose Christ should descend on the nations—many expect Christ will come among the nations sonally—suppose that to-morrow morning the Son of God from a hovering cloud should descend upon these cities. Would not that fact be known all the world in twenty-four hours? Suppose he should present his Gospel in a few words, say "I am the Son of God; I came to pay all your sins and to heal all your sorrows to prove that I am a supernatural being have just descended from the clouds. Do you believe Me, and do you believe now?" Why, all the telegraph stations of the earth would be crowded as none of them were ever crowded just after a shipwreck. I tell you all these things to show you it is not among the impossibilities even the improbabilities that Christ will

There is a class of phenomena which makes me think that the spiritual and the merely world may, after awhile, make a demonstration in this world which will include all moral and spiritual things to a certain extent. Now, I am no spiritualist; but every intelligent man has noticed that there are strange and mysterious things which are quite adequate to him that perhaps the spiritual world is not so far off as sometimes we are inclined to think. And that after awhile, from the material and heavenly world there may be a demonstration upon our world for its betterment. We call it magnetism, or we call it mesmerism, or we call it electricity, or we use some other term, but we use some term to cover up our ignorance. I do not know what it is. I have heard an audible voice from the other world. I am persuaded of this, however: That the veil between this world and the next is getting thinner and thinner, and that perhaps after awhile, at the call of God—not at the call of the Davenport Brothers, or Andrew Jackson Davis—some of the old Scriptural warriors, some of the spirits of other days mighty for God—a Joshua, or a Caleb, or a David, or a Paul—may come down and help us in the battle against unrighteousness. Oh, how I would like to have them here—him of the Red Sea, him of the valley of Ajalon, him of Mars' Hill! English history says that Robert Clayton, of the English cavalry, at the close of the war bought up all the old cavalry horses lest they should be turned out to drudgery and hard work, and bought a piece of ground at Knavesmere Heath and turned out these old war-horses into the thickest and richest pasture to spend the rest of their days as compensation for what they had done in other days. One day a thunderstorm came up and these war-horses mistook the thunder of the skies for the thunder of battle—and they wheeled into line—no riders on their backs—they wheeled into line ready for the fray. And I doubt me whether, when the last thunder of this battle for God and truth goes booming through the heavens, the old Scriptural warriors can keep their places on their thrones. Methinks they will spring into the fight and exchange crown for helmet.

A BEVY OF WEE TENEMENT MAIDS AT MONT-LAWN.

and palm-branch for weapon, and come down out of the King's galleries into the arena, crying: "Make room! I must fight in this great Armageddon." The old war-horses mingling in the fight.

Beloved people, I preach this sermon because I want you to toil with the sunlight in your faces. I want you old men to understand before you die that all the work you did for God while yet your ear was alert and your foot fleet is going to be counted up in the final victories. I want all these younger people to understand, that when they toil for God they always win the day; that all prayers are answered and all Christian work is in some way effectual, and that the tide is setting in the right direction, and that all heaven is on our side—saintly, cherubic, archangelic, omnipotent, chariot and throne, doxology and procession, principalities and dominion, he who hath the moon under his feet, and all the armies of heaven on white horses.

Brother! brother! all I am afraid of is, not that Christ will lose the battle, but that you and I will not get into it quick enough to do something worthy of our blood-bought immortality. O Christ, how shall I meet thee, thou of the scarred brow and the scarred back and the scarred hand and the scarred foot and the scarred breast, if I have no scars gotten in thy service? If we do not suffer with him on earth, we cannot be glorified with him in heaven. Take good heart. On! On! On! See! the skies have brightened! See! the hour is about to come. Pick out all the cheeriest of the anthems. Let the orchestra string their best instruments. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand."

three years ago, it has been our aim, as far as practicable, to have as helpers preferably those who have already done active personal service in the field of Christian work, either at home or abroad.

Miss Esther Bornstein is a native of Constantinople, Turkey, and was educated at the American College for Girls in Scutari. She is now a junior in the Women's Medical College of the New York Infirmary, preparing there as a medical missionary to work among the Turkish women. She has been engaged in mission work in New York for two years. This has been her first season at Mont-Lawn. Miss Mary Swift Wright is from Lock Haven, Pa., where her father is a Presbyterian pastor. She is a graduate of Wellesley College, and has been a teacher for three years past. This is her first year of missionary work. Miss May B. Van Name, of New York City, and Miss Bessie Ferris, of Chatham, N. S., have both had their first missionary experience at Mont-Lawn this year. Miss Lillian Drane, of Brooklyn, is a public school teacher of ten years' experience, and has just had her first missionary season. Miss Edith Kelson, of New York, has been connected with the Children's Home for two years. She is a kindergarten teacher in one of the schools under the direction of the "Home for the Friendless Society," in New York City. Under her clever tutelage, the calisthenics of the children at Mont-Lawn have been a very pleasant feature of the season. Miss age. It was a strange gathering that assembled in the examining-room at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices one forenoon to "pass the doctor,"—literally a room-full of the maimed, the sick, and the blind. Sickly little mothers, and frail, delicate babies, and the crippled, and the disabled, were specially chosen. One wee girl, hunch-backed, like little Number 5000, was among the number, and there were others laboring under different forms of physical affliction. Yet all seemed to share the general happiness at the prospect of a pleasant health-giving holiday in the country.

Silent, but with her thin white face beaming with joy, a girl sat back of the others and next the wall of the room. A glance at her revealed the fact that she was blind, indeed, almost eveless. She had been so afflicted from birth. Never had she seen the sweet light of the sun, nor the color of the flowers, nor the smile of a friendly face.

"It's Mary M—," said Mrs. St. James, a kind lady who had brought the poor blind girl and several others as candidates for admission to the Home. "She is a dear, gentle creature, patient amid her afflictions. Poor thing! She never had a holiday before, I believe, and now she is perfectly delighted to think that she is going away. Aren't you, Mary?"

The blind girl nodded, smiled, and gave utterance to some words which, owing to a defect in the vocal organs, were only half articulated. Inquiry revealed a sad story. Mary is an orphan, and lives in rear rooms in a tenement on Avenue A, with her brother and sister. Her brother's wife is insane and his little daughter lives with Mary and the rest—worse than motherless. For many months the brother has had no work and Mary's sister—a brave little woman with a heart of gold—has fought the battle for all.

Many a day they have gone hungry, but as the little woman looked at poor, blind Mary—her care since childhood—her heart rose again to the conflict, and she worked the harder. But there were times when work was scarce and money was scarcer, and had it not been for the kindness of some of the neighbors the household must have fared sorely indeed. On another floor of the same tenement, lives a widower with his three little motherless children whom Mary's sister has looked after while the father was away at work. For this she receives a trifle in pay, but when there are so many mouths to be fed, and the rent to pay, such trifles hardly count. But the good-hearted widower, knowing there were poor and hungry folks overhead, has sometimes befriended them by having Mary's sister cook his Sunday dinner, and then the blind girl's family are sure, at least, of one hunger-appeasing meal week.

Blind Mry looks like a child—many a girl of twelve or fourteen is more of a woman than she, though she is twenty-eight. She is utterly helpless, and so weak intellectually that she can learn little or nothing. Some one of the kind patrons of our Children's Home has made her happier than she ever was in her life, for it costs no more to care for her at Mont-Lawn than it did for any of the little tots who have been there during the summer. Her's is a sad history, but it has its duplicate in many a home of poverty in the great city.

Solomon Anointed King.

Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 4th. I Kings 1: 28-39. Golden Text, I Kings 2: 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SOLOMON was the son of Bathsheba, the partner in David's grievous sin, and yet he was the chosen of God to succeed David on the throne, and to build the temple "for the name of the Lord!"

A man and woman who had shamefully fallen, and caused the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, were yet in their deep repentance and brokenness of heart, brought near to the high and holy One that inhabiteth eternity! David and Bathsheba were chosen of God to be the parents of a man whom God should endow with wisdom beyond anyone who had lived before him, and with power and glory which should bring him into prominence throughout the known world of his time, and in remembrance throughout all ages. Truly God brings forth glory.

Out of Shame!

David was advanced in age when Adonijah, probably his eldest living son, "exalted himself, saying, I will be king." "Whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself, shall be exalted" (Matt. 23: 12), and Adonijah was no exception. God had already spoken to David about his successor; it was not left to be settled by the ambition or party spirit of men. Even before David's sin, God had foreseen and chosen the son which should succeed him: "When thy days be fulfilled and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, . . . he shall build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his Father, and he shall be my son." (II Sam. 7: 12-14). After the birth of Solomon whom the Lord loved, Amnon, David's first-born son died by the hand of his brother Absalom; probably also Chil-eab or Daniel, his second son had died. Later on, Absalom died in the midst of his rebellion, leaving Adonijah as the next in succession by birthright. But David had not inherited his throne from a long line of royal ancestors. God took him from the sheepfold to be king over his people, and he would in the same manner exercise his right to choose David's successor from among his sons. Adonijah had followed the example of Absalom in preparing chariots and horsemen and fifty men to run before him. His vanity and assumption were not unknown to his father, but the old king had never rebuked him (I Kings 1: 5-6). Now things went farther; he won over to his side the priest Abiathar, the only remaining representative of the house of Eli, and also Joab who had always been such a thorn in David's side, and yet had remained true to him until now.

Nathan the prophet, whose concern was that God should be glorified, and his word fulfilled sought out Bathsheba. Why should the prophet seek her rather than go directly to David or to Solomon? May it not have been, is it not more than probable, that of all who lived at the court of David, this forgiven sinner lived the nearest to God, and Nathan, directed by the God he served, could trust a delicate and difficult business to one who knew how to wait upon the Lord, especially as the powers of the old king were, by this time, on the wane. Nathan knew that at that moment which he has prepared that a thing shall be done, and those who are in the habit of hearkening to him are not left to the mercy of the Lord. Nathan was the Lord God of Israel which hath as to what she should say to the king, and how she should remind him of his oath to her in accordance with God's word to him (I Chron. 22: 7-11), and the prophet promised her that he would follow her into the chamber where the aged king was, and confirm her words.

How much might hang upon a few moments! How powerless in herself must Bathsheba have felt! According to earthly custom, Adonijah had the human right on his side; if he were persistent, another civil war might break out. But Bathsheba had the word of God to rest upon. Strong only in the Lord, she went forward, entered the chamber, bowed and did obeisance. "What wouldest thou?" said the king. "My lord, thou swarest by the Lord thy God unto thine handmaid, saying, Assuredly, Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne; and now behold, Adonijah reigneth; and now, my lord the king, thou knowest it not: and he hath slain (or sacrificed) oxen, and fat cattle, and sheep in abundance, and hath called all the sons of the king, and Abiathar the priest, and Joab the captain of the host; but Solomon thy servant hath he not called. And thou, my lord, O king, the eyes of all Israel are upon thee that thou shouldst tell them who should sit on the throne of my lord the king after him. Otherwise it shall come to pass, when my lord the king shall sleep with his fathers, that I and my son Solomon shall be counted offenders."

Hardly had Bathsheba ceased to speak when Nathan, with the same obeisance, approached the king, and said, "My lord, O king, hast thou said, Adonijah shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne?" And the prophet described in yet stronger language the assumption of the throne by Adonijah and how his adherents were saying: "God save king Adonijah," and he added, "Is this thing done by my lord the king, and thou hast not shewed it unto thy servant, who should sit on the throne of my lord the king after him?" Nathan had been David's truest friend, and his appeal added to that of Bathsheba was used of God to rouse the failing powers of the king for a last effort.

And the Thing was Done that same day. With no previous preparation, no high state or grandeur, but in the blessed consciousness that they were carrying out the mind of God as well as the mind of the king, these men anointed Solomon. What about Adonijah? When men are in the line of God's will they may leave all consequences to him. Wicked men are afraid when they see that the tide turns against them. There are no such cowards as they who know they are not in the will of God. David never exalted himself, never made a position for himself. God had chosen him, and he was satisfied that God should call him to the throne in his own time. Absalom and Adonijah, born princes because they were David's sons, both of them were ambitious for something more. Each of them wanted the kingdom for himself. It was not for the benefit of the people they sought it, but the position for themselves. God could not be with them in such a pursuit.

While the adherents of Adonijah were feasting, a sudden and then increasing sound first of the trumpet and then of musical instruments, mixed with a multitude of voices, made the city ring again. What could it be? Joab inquired, "Wherefore is this noise of the city being in an uproar?" And Jonathan the son of Abiathar, one of the very men who had been so true to David in the time of Absalom's rebellion told the startled company what had occurred, and how Solomon was sitting on the throne of the kingdom, and the Lord God of Israel which hath given one to sit on my throne this day, mine eyes even seeing it." And the rebellion of Adonijah and his pretensions to the kingdom melted like smoke before the wind. Fear seized upon the guests, they disappeared before their names could be known, and Adonijah fled to the tabernacle, and laid hold of the horns of the altar in terror for his life. Thence Solomon sent for him and he did obeisance to him and retired to his own house. Thus God undertook, civil war was averted, and God's chosen king reigned. But this is not all, God had said of Solomon, "I have chosen him to be my son, and I will be his father. More over I will establish his kingdom for ever if he be constant to do my commandments and my judgment as at this day."

HE tragic death of Amnon and Absalom left Adonijah the next heir to the throne.

Whether he felt sure of succeeding, or had any apprehension of Solomon being preferred, does not appear. However it may have been, he assumed the position of heir-apparent and, like Absalom, set up a chariot and a large retinue of servants. David had become a chronic invalid and appeared to have lost all interest in public affairs. He probably knew nothing of Adonijah's proceedings. Apparently he had made Bathsheba a promise at some earlier time that her son Solomon should be his successor. Bathsheba, alarmed for the safety of herself and her son in the event of Adonijah becoming king, by the advice of Nathan, reminded David of his promise. It was not too soon, for Adonijah, too impatient to wait for his father's death, was conspiring to seize the crown and was actually holding a feast of his friends which was to end in his proclamation. Even Joab who had held aloof from the previous conspiracy, was concerned in the plot. With a flash of his old promptitude, David roused himself to thwart the plotters and directed that Solomon should be made king at once, without waiting for his own death. Josephus says Solomon was only fourteen years old at the time, but other facts show that he was mistaken and that Solomon must have been about twenty years of age.

It was a very different position that Solomon occupied from that of David, thirty-three years earlier, when he became king. In the interval Israel had become a powerful nation. Moab had been subdued, Ammon humiliated, the Philistine power was broken, and even Syria was forced to pay tribute. The borders of the nation had been extended and the peoples on all sides had learned to respect the new power. The treasury was full to overflowing, and a large well-organized and well-equipped army had taken the place of the poor thousand warriors who responded to Saul's call to arms. A great opportunity was in Solomon's hands. David was anxious that he should use it for the welfare of the kingdom. The records show that the old king pleaded with him tenderly and eloquently to walk in the ways of the Lord, assuring him that in that way alone could he hope to prosper. He had secured the independence of the nation, and it rested with Solomon to make it great in the sense of being good. That was Israel's role in the family of nations. Other peoples have been eminent in war, other science, others in civil government others in art—it was Israel's genius the leader in spirituality and godliness. She was to be the religious teacher of the world. Solomon might make it an nation, or he might degrade it and his by idolatry, or by giving himself to voluptuous pleasures like other Oriental kings. The same opportunity, in league, is before every youth. He has destinies of the kingdom of his being hands. It is open to him to sink by indulgence to the level of the beasts, live as a son of God.

God save King Solomon. The wisest best men need to be saved and God can save them. People sometimes think that the world might get along without religion, but it is the best thing the world has. An eminent missionary, who traveled far and seen much, recently testified: "I have visited the Islands of the New Hebrides; I have visited Loyalty Group; I have seen missionary work in the Samoan Group; I know the Islands of the Society Group; I lived ten years in the Hervey Group, nine years among the savages of Guinea; I have had twenty-one year experience among barbarians; I have the uncivilized and the semi-civilized have lived with the Christian native. I have lived, dined, and slept with cannibal; but I have never yet met one man or woman, that civilization without Christianity has civilized."

I have appointed him to be ruler. It was a magnificent position, but its responsibilities were great. There is nothing in the universe more terrible than to be false to the duties of the position we occupy whether it be humble or exalted. Moody tells the story of a visit to an asylum for the insane, where he saw most pitiful case. It was that of a man who never ceased uttering one cry, a walked from morning till night the corridors of the asylum, groaning and wringing hands. His only words were: "If I had." This was his story: He was employed by a railroad company to take care of a swing-bridge, and he received a spatch from the superintendent that a train would pass over the road, that he must not turn the bridge until the train had passed. One after another came and tried to have him open the swing bridge, and he refused to do it. At last a friend came and over-persuaded him, he opened the bridge. He had no more than done so, when he heard the train coming. There was not time to close bridge, and he saw the train leap, with its living freight, into the abyss of death. His reason reeled and tottered upon throne, and the man went mad. His words were: "If I only had! If I only had!"

He shall sit upon my throne in my stead. David was conscious of senility. He was quite willing to commit the honors and responsibilities of royalty to his son's hands. He evidently had confidence in Solomon's ability which must have been a relief to him. The story is told of an aged Roman General, who was moved to tears as he watched the front ranks of a procession. They were composed of veterans who fought in many battles. "They cannot much longer," said the General, "and it is fit to take their place?" By and by came the men of middle age in their procession. "These are brave men," said the General's friend, "they have taken the place of the fathers." The General admitted that they were brave, but they would become old, too, in a few years. The rear of the procession was made up of young men and children. The old man scanned their bright faces as they passed, and lifting his eyes to heaven, exclaimed: "It is enough, the Empire is safe!"

The Lord God of my lord the king, say too. Kings sometimes forget that God's confirmation of their decrees is necessary. They boast that they have done or will do this or that involving the fate of an empire forgetting that God rules the world. Nathan ventured the hope that God would confirm David's words. It is related that a modern instance of a similar reminiscence came from the other side of a colloquy, a speech of congratulation to Queen Elizabeth on the defeat of the Spanish Armada by the Speaker of the House of Commons. He said that the Queen's mighty arm, meaning the English fleet, had delivered the count. "No," the Queen exclaimed, "the count was delivered by the mighty arm of God."

CAMPAIGN AMONG THE PINES.

Tent Work by American Sunday School Missionaries in Wisconsin—Many Conversions—A Number of Schools Founded.

A REMARKABLE campaign of Gospel Tent Meetings has just closed at Petersburg, on the lower Kickapoo River in Crawford county, Wis. Early in the spring the attention of W. W. Wheeler, an earnest missionary of the American S. S. Union, was called to this region. Upon his first visit, he found a number of communities peculiarly ready for the organization of Sunday Schools, but also for spiritual harvests, missions attending even his first visit. The facts will show the religious destitution of the region. Crawford county, situated between the Mississippi and Wisconsin rivers, has a population of 17,203, the exception of Prairie du Chien, there are no towns with a population over 1,000. Taking the portion south of a line east and west at Belle Centre, there are twenty miles north and south and twenty-six east and west, with a population (largely Protestant) of 8,244, excepting of Prairie du Chien City. In this region there are only ten English-speaking Protestant Churches, with a total average

Barnum, a little village on the Kickapoo Valley railroad. In close succession five places were visited: Barnum, Steuben, Harris' Ridge, Foskett's, and Petersburg. Twelve days' meetings, including two Sundays, were generally held in each place, excepting Foskett's, where the interest was so great the workers tarried the third week. A very interesting feature of the work was the Sunday School rallies, which were held at four of the points visited. From six to eight schools were present in force at each rally. At Harris' Ridge, where the tent was pitched in a beautiful grove, the interest was so great that although the harvest was pressing, large audiences were in attendance nightly, and when Sunday School "Rally Day" came, eight tired teams were sent to Wauzeka to bring the Sabbath School there to the rally, although it involved a drive of twenty miles. Mr. F. G. Ensign, of Chicago, Superintendent of the American Sunday School Union, came all the way to be present at this meeting. The rally at Barnum was pronounced by "old settlers" to have been the largest and most enthusiastic Sunday School gathering ever held in the Lower Kickapoo. The closing day at Foskett's was a memorable one, and the tent could scarcely contain the audiences. At night it was filled with people who came through a drenching rain. The service was one of marked power, and as the rain steadily beat upon the tent, the meeting was continued till a late hour, and after dismissal, the people remained to sing hymns and to talk over the ance probably not to exceed 800. There are 3,155 children of school age, probably not 500 of these are enrolled in day Schools, including eight schools Mr. Wheeler organized. From Belle Center to Wauzeka, following the Kickapoo valley, a distance of twenty-five miles and for several miles back on each side there was but one Sunday School before Mr. Wheeler began his work. Mr. Wheeler organized his first school in this region April 17. In a very short time seven more schools were in operation. According to the plan of the American Sunday School Union he sought to place all schools under the care of some one. Funds were secured for a new building for the Gospel Tent, the old one having been shattered in the cyclone. Arrangements were made whereby John Willan of the Upper Kickapoo gave his whole time to the work. A remarkably clear and scriptural presentation of the Gospel contributed largely to the success of the campaign. His kind daughter, efficient helpers in testimony and song, accompanied the tent. Missionary Wheeler also gave his full time to the work, assisting in the meetings and giving a general oversight of all that was done. Others, A. D. Maes, Missionary of the American S. S. Union; the veteran minister, Rev. A. Pinkerton, and Rev. L. Cheney, General Missionary of the Congregationalists, rendered assistance at various times. The Kickapoo Valley has been called the "Gem of Wisconsin." Beautiful valleys, imposing bluffs, ridges crowned with wild maple forests in every direction, strike the eye. The large tent for the assembly and the smaller one that housed the workers, made a beautiful appearance among the great trees. The campaign began May 28, when the tent was pitched at meetings they had enjoyed together. The campaign closed at Petersburg, Aug. 5th, where eight days of services were held, which took strong hold upon that community. Unfortunately, a furious storm the last afternoon overturned the tent, slightly injuring one of the workers.

Although the religious privileges in this region have been meagre, yet the people are most intelligent and well disposed toward religious things, very kindly receiving the messengers as well as its message. As a partial result of these ten weeks of tent work, one hundred and ten sermons have been preached to people many of whom otherwise would scarcely have heard a sermon, and to audiences ranging from a score to nearly seven hundred. Four large Sunday School rallies have been held which have done much to awaken interest in Sunday School work in the county. Six regular meeting places have been opened, three regular prayer meetings have been started, and two Christian Endeavor Societies, and two Congregational Churches are soon to be formed with prospect of at least two more in the near future.

RALLY OF EIGHT SUNDAY SCHOOLS AMONG THE PINES.

It is difficult to tell the number of conversions. At Barnum, sixteen signed a covenant to live for Christ, and about thirty expressed a desire to live a Christian life. At Steuben, eighteen persons signed the covenant. One of the brightest conversions here was of a man sixty-seven years of age. At Harris Ridge, thirty-four signed the covenant, and nearly every person of the large number who regularly attended the meetings expressed a purpose to live a Christian life. Probably more than one hundred and fifty persons in all have taken their stand for Christ and are now under the care of a pastor, Mr. F. C. Bliss of Yale Seminary, who has done good work in following up the tent meetings and will hold this ground until permanent arrangements can be made. Great credit is due the American Sunday School Union, which entered this region, opened the eight Sunday Schools and co-operated through the ten weeks of meetings. The results, whatever they may be, will be largely the outgrowth of this admirable system of missionary work.

ary, writes as follows: "I am in receipt of very gratifying reports concerning the progress of the schools organized this year, and have been continuing the work of organizing in the heated term: made twenty-five visits to families in a country district one day; addressed the people and organized a school at night, fifty-nine persons having promised to attend it. Another country district visited was very indifferent about a Sunday School, but hearing of a picnic in the woods, not for Sunday School purposes, but for amusement and dancing, I attended it and obtained permission of the master of ceremonies to deliver an address. When there was a pause in the music, I stepped into the arena, and asked them to unite with me in singing, 'The Sweet By-and-Bye.'

At the conclusion of the singing I addressed them, telling them the glad tidings of salvation, and urging everyone to make sure of heaven by accepting Jesus. Their instruments were an organ and a violin, and dancing was their principal exercise, but they also had a greased pole, slender and tall. If any youth succeeded in climbing to the top he was to have a dollar as a reward. I did not remain to witness the dancing and climbing. When I closed my address I announced an appointment for a Sunday School meeting the day following (Sunday), at a neglected old church building, at which time I organized a school which has now five teachers and forty-five scholars.

"The next neighborhood visited was also in great need of a school, but the encouragement to effort was very little—just such a place of moral darkness as needed missionary work badly. Besides the general apathy of the people, it was said the trustees would not allow us to organize in the school-house. I drove several miles in a most oppressive heat, to see each trustee, and having secured the consent of a majority, succeeded in organizing, with an earnest Christian for Superintendent.

After that I visited and addressed a Sunday School Assembly which met in a grove. Five schools were represented and with their friends, made a large concourse. It was a township convention, under the management of a brother who was converted at a meeting I conducted several years ago. Next day, I drove to a picnic somewhat like the one first mentioned, having music and dancing, with the addition of a political speech, in a grove. I obtained consent to deliver a Sunday School address, and it received an attentive hearing from a portion of the audience, but I think it had not much influence with another portion, who, after the sermon and songs, resumed their fiddling and dancing."

In the course of his work our missionary has frequently to put up at strange places. The photograph above shows one of these—a Kansas sod house, out on the lonely plains. Not a very inviting mansion, but the Divine grace can illuminate even a hovel and transform it into a palace.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

IN order to avoid sore disappointment to our friends who contemplate availing themselves of our marvelous World-Wide Encyclopedia offer, we hereby give due notice and timely warning that we cannot fill any orders for The World-Wide Encyclopedia MAILED after the 30th DAY OF SEPTEMBER. This is absolutely final, and it will save us and our friends a vast deal of annoyance and useless correspondence if they will kindly govern themselves accordingly.

In reply to numerous inquiries as to how long we will hold a set of The World-Wide Encyclopedia for persons who cannot now afford to deposit more than $1, as an earnest of their serious intentions, we wish to state that when requested so to do at the time the deposit is made, we will hold a complete set of The World-Wide Encyclopedia for SIX MONTHS FROM SEPT. 1st, 1896, and that as soon as the balance of $4 is sent in, we will ship the complete set of fifteen volumes. And now that those who are anxious to possess themselves of this invaluable Compendium of Knowledge may act intelligently in this matter, we here, and for the last time, REPEAT THE OFFER IN FULL, and trust that it may prove profitable reading to many.

Under no circumstances will orders or first deposits on account of the Encyclopedia mailed after September 30th, be recognized at this office.

Any one sending ten subscribers for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the regular subscription price, $1.50 each, will receive a set of The World-Wide Encyclopedia free. We do not pay freight charges, however. It makes no difference whether you are an old subscriber or a new subscriber. As the offer will positively be withdrawn this month, you should send us $5, on receipt of which we will immediately ship the Encyclopedia. Then apply yourself to getting the ten subscribers. Send the subscriptions in as fast as you receive them, retaining a half dollar from each one. When you have secured the ten subscriptions you will have refunded to yourself the $5 which you advanced to make sure of The World-Wide Encyclopedia. The sooner you get the subscriptions, the sooner you get your $5 back. We will allow you all the time required to make good the ten subscribers. Take your own time about it, and do the best you can.

All that is necessary under these circumstances is to write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about as follows: "Enclosed, please find $5 for which send me a complete set of The World-Wide Encyclopedia. Ship via (here state the route), to (here state the station). If the books are satisfactory, I will send you ten subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as soon as I am able to secure them, and I will send them separately as fast as I get them, retaining fifty cents from each subscriber."

"If I am not pleased with the books, after inspecting them, I reserve the right to return them within ten days after they reach my hands, in which case you will refund the $5 herewith enclosed." Sign your name and enclose the money either by money order, draft, or if you send cash, register your letter.

In reply to your request for a description of the World-Wide Encyclopedia we received from our issue of August 5: The World-Wide Encyclopedia answers every question, however difficult or abstruse. A digest of all knowledge from the earliest times is contained within its pages, and no person, however untutored, provided he can read, need lack for full information on any subject. It covers the scope of human knowledge, when once he is the possessor of this work of universal interest. The World-Wide Encyclopedia is an epitome of the "sum total of wisdom and knowledge." It treats fully and exhaustively of every subject of human interest, whether history, science, literature, art, religion, philosophy, etc., etc., from the beginning of things down to the practical questions of our own day. It is a fountain of knowledge on all subjects, and contains more compact wisdom than was ever stored in the brain of the greatest sage on earth.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia contains more than 1,000,000 letters on file from people all over the country, who are congratulating themselves on their exceeding good fortune in having secured a set of the World-Wide Encyclopedia, and we hope to number you among them.

shelf make a striking array nearly two feet in length. The set weighs about 40 pounds, and not many years ago it would have taken $200 to buy it, but this is the day of labor-saving machinery, enterprise, and low prices. The proprietor of this journal, in order to make this remarkable offer, and with a view of offering every man, woman and child who desires a liberal education, an opportunity of acquiring it without any financial sacrifice, purchased six car-loads of Encyclopedias, aggregating in weight nearly 200,000 pounds, and so great has been the demand for this wonderful work that within the first two weeks nearly 20 tons were shipped to the subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who availed themselves of this exceptional opportunity. The offer will positively be withdrawn late this month, and this is the final call to all who intend to secure this great work.

If you cannot send $5, send what you can, but not less than $1, and we will reserve one set for you until you have earned it, or until you send the balance of the deposit. In several instances, persons who earned a set of the Encyclopedia by sending ten subscribers at $1.50 each, afterwards sold their set for $20 or more, and then started in to earn a second set. We have nearly 1,000 letters on file from people all over the country, who are congratulating themselves on their exceeding good fortune in having secured a set of the World-Wide Encyclopedia, and we hope to number you among them.

Subscriber, White, La. 1. What is your opinion of a professing Christian consulting a gypsy fortune teller, and then standing up a Christian as a result of the information obtained? 2. Do these gypsies possess any ability to tell anything to people other than what they want to hear, or are they merely charlatans?

1. Such conduct would certainly not be an evidence of Christianity, but the contrary. 2. No; such persons are simply charlatans who make a living out of the credulity and superstition of ignorant people.

Subscriber, the Truth, James City, N.J. 1. Is the ancient Talmud printed in English? 2. What does the Talmud contain?

1. An "Introduction to the Talmud," by M. Wiesner, is published by the American Hebrew Publishing House, Chicago, but we do not know of any publication in English of the Talmud as a whole. It is not one volume, but a series of twelve folio volumes, of religious, moral, and civil laws, science, antiquities, maxims, legends, and parables. 2. A certain part of the ancient Talmud was called the Toledoth Yeshu ba Nossah ("the Generation of Jesus the Nazarene"). It contained the statement that Jesus was hanged at the direction of the Jewish sages, and that the body was taken down at sunset and buried outside the city. All mention of Jesus was with a view to depreciate him and his work. The Toledoth Yeshu was expurgated from the Talmud in 1630, by order of the Jewish Assembly at Jaroslav in Little Poland, and all mention of Christ was directed to be suppressed in the Talmud thereafter. These circumstances are familiar to most Jewish scholars. Jesus is incidentally mentioned by several Greek and Roman secular authors, including Tacitus, Annals, XV, 44, 3; Pliny, Epistle X, 97; Lucian, Suetonius, Eusebius, and others.

A "Mother" sends us this note which many will read approvingly:

A. M., Macomb, Ill. Don't you think if fathers were what they ought to be, every child would be born with heart attuned to the "eternal harmonies"? The mother cannot change the inborn nature of the father may have given his child. We mothers would be glad if preachers everywhere would preach more to the boys and impress them with the great responsibility of being good men. It seems to us that there are very few real fathers in the world at present. I have two boys, and my greatest wish for them is "that they may be genuine, true, good fathers."

M. M., Colon, Neb. 1. When a Christian feels that Christ has forsaken him, is he justified in thinking that Christ is trying his faith? 2. Are Christians bound to be friendly with persons of an inferior class, if they are Christians, too?

1. He would be more likely to be right if he looked for the cause in himself. Jesus remains the same and does not needlessly or causelessly withdraw himself. The alienation comes usually from consciousness of some duty neglected, or some wrong feeling indulged, or from sin. When a Christian becomes proud and self-sufficient, Christ often withdraws his loving presence and the Christian learns by sad experience how weak he is. 2. The consciousness of brotherhood in Christ should be a stronger bond of union than social rank. There ought to be cordiality and kindness, and care that the brother in Christ should not have his feelings hurt by any heedlessness.

The Jewish historian and Hestaeus both mention the Tower in detail. There are two mounds near Hillah (supposed to be on the site of ancient Babylon), in Mesopotamia, one being the ruin of the so-called "Babylon," the other a ruin called Babil. The former, which some eminent scholars and investigators believe may be the remains of Babel, is of seven stages or stories, in pyramid with a shrine or chapel on top, the whole being 153 1/2 feet. The height of Babil (other ruin) is 140 feet.

Subscriber, Clermont, N. Y. 1. What did our Lord mean by saying Mark 4: 11, "that he might give them the secrets of the Kingdom of God"? 2. Why did our Lord who is the Prince of Peace say Matt. 10: 34, "I came not to send peace but a sword"? 3. We cannot conceive of Christ Christ that form of teaching with the deliberate pose of preventing the people benefit his words. There were a number of people came to listen to him out of idle curiosity with no serious intention of obeying his disciples and others who had cast in their lot with him listened that they might be wanted them to be. The two classes were tested by the plan of teaching in Parables. The curious, idle people would hear and be pleased with the story, without perceiving the spiritual lesson, while the disciples were intent on the lesson Christ wished to convey. The former class would probably have listened at all to direct unadorned teaching. They would listen to the story, they had a sincere desire to learn they see the truth, if not, they would forget the story. 2. It was a prediction, not a pose. As a matter of fact, discipleship produced the severance of domestic ties, hatred and persecution. If a member of a family became a Christian, he was hated and persecuted.

Subscriber, Adrian, Mich. 1. How can I get back the peace and joy I had when I was first converted? 2. The Holy Spirit will lead us into truth, have we any need of help? 3. How can I save my child as to the existence of God? 1. Prayer is an effective means. Another good method is to stay away from yourself to Christ. No person is well who is content feeling his own pulse, taking temperature, and watching his symptoms, so no Christian is in a satisfactory condition who is much introspection. Try to lead a good life, free from sin; try to have some soul for Christ and some trouble about your peace at heart. They will come as you grow in usefulness. 2. The Holy Spirit uses the preacher to lead you into truth. Human help is not to be depended on. 3. The child can be saved himself that things do not come into existence of themselves, that is an active cause for every child a builder for the house, a man the watch. Even a child must understand that there is a first original Cause for all. You make him understand God; a man intellect cannot grasp the finite, but you can tell him about and he will be impressed by you say. Children have more in their parents' belief than is realized.

Mrs. R. T. S., Grove City, Pa. 1. I have a denomination, the Ammonia, where can I find the most reasonable price for the Bible, as I wish to get four for present.

1. This has been repeatedly answered before. They do not belong to any of the denominations, but are Christians of various forms of worship and liturgy very similar to the Orthodox Greek Church. 2. You can obtain the very finest editions of International Teachers' Bibles as premiums through subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD either $2 or $3, according to the quality of the paper for one year in addition to the premium.

Rev. George T. Smith of Chicago writes: You were right in saying in answer to a question in THE MAIL-BAG that it was possible that there were Unitarians or Socinians among the ministers of the Disciples of Christ, a matter of fact there are none. In a try of twenty-seven years among them I met with only one instance of a ministering Unitarian doctrine, and he was obliged to withdraw.

There are, however, some Christians whose disposition and manner and bent of mind are such that another Christian could not find pleasure in their society. He is not bound to make close companions of people who are not congenial. But he can be cordial and kind even to those whom he does not admit to intimate friendship.

L. M. P., Shadysburg, Pa. What is the religion of the Unitarians?

They are Protestant and Evangelical, with reformed tendencies. They hold that the Lord's Supper is merely a memorial feast, reject infant baptism and the sacraments generally, read the Bible diligently, are opposed to war, will take no interest on money loaned, and are clean, honest, temperate, and moral. They have no common Confession of Faith.

Reader, Essex Junction, Vt. Is it right for a minister of the Gospel to play cards and teach the young people how to play, if he thinks it isn't wrong?

We cannot comprehend how any pastor can regard card-playing as otherwise than detrimental to morals. It has proved a road to ruin for millions. Cards are the favorite amusement of the gambler, and their very touch is contaminating to the self-respecting man or woman. They are to be classed as among those obstacles to spiritual growth which the Christian should carefully avoid.

John H. Bishop, Ark. Have you any historical data as to the height of the Tower of Babel?

Nothing definite is now known as to its height, although the tradition of its existence is found among other nations besides the Jews. The Chaldeans are probably the earliest authority. Plato declares that the tradition dated back to the "Golden Age," and Josephus

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Conversion the Best Cure.

I MET my friend, Mrs. Bentley, the other evening at a mother's meeting. She looked very sad, and all the hour of the meeting I had noticed that her worn, sensitive face had a preoccupied expression, so that she hardly heard what was going on. But when we sang, "Even her rare contralto voice joined in sweetly and clearly, a pathetic vibration in the tones, and I heard her, syllable by syllable, as we repeated in unison the Lord's Prayer. Everybody went at last. I linger usually for a little social talk after our exercises are over, and finally Mrs. Bentley came to say good-night. I thought perhaps I'd walk home with her," she said, "if you'll let me. I've something to tell you. I'm going to leave John."

"Oh, no! Mrs. Bentley," I answered. "I can't bear to think that matters between you two, who love each other so dearly, have reached such a pass. John's hope is in you standing by him." "I have stood by him," she replied. "I have endured his rough usage, but he is not himself, have interfered with my own body as a shield between my children and their father, have toiled and slaved and suffered till my patience and my strength were all gone. I've pawned everything I could raise a dollar on, and at the moment I'm afraid we'll be evicted for the rent. Not that I've anything much left, but we have no shelter! And John gets more and more; each time he goes on one of those awful bouts, he is deeper. I don't think it's my fault to stay with him, and I mean to let my children and go back to my mother."

"And John?" She shook her head impatiently. "I tell you, I've done with John. He will be in the gutter next, and he will drag us there with him." "Is she said, Emma Bentley, like any other tempest-tossed wife of a mother, had reached the end of her patience. Yet, notwithstanding, she wanted to let this partnership of husband and wife dissolve in such a way. I knew there were still possibilities of good in John, if he could only be saved. And he loved Emma, and Emma loved him, and they loved their children. Nevertheless, after two months or so witnessed a spell of the usually affectionate husband transformed into a demon or a brute, when he squandered his wages and went off with low companions, and was sometimes demented for all practical purposes for days. The Bentleys grew poorer and poorer. He had been a brilliant business man; he grew to be so uncertain and so gloomy his grip on the world that he belonged to the company whom no man would touch. Mrs. Bentley took in sewing, took in fine washing and ironing, did whatever came to her hand, and held on to John as long and loyally. But at last she was desperate and discouraged.

"There is a cure!" I said to myself, "I'm going to the floor of my room that night, and I'm going to pray for these two. For before them, if they separated, only ruin, swift ruin, slow for her. The hardening of his nature, the weakening of his, and in the end, the dreary, dreary years stretching out before their feet, a veritable via dolorosa, a path through the desert. There is a cure! John Bentley must be brought to Christ. No soundly converted man will be a drunkard. Any drunkard, soundly converted, will give up the sin that fetters him, and become Christ's free man."

I waylaid John Bentley. I met him next day, slouching along, ragged, ashamed, bittered, trying to avoid my glance and his outstretched hand.

"Hello John!" I cried, "I've been looking for you. Come up home with me; there's something wrong with our old clock."

John Bentley was an amateur mechanic and loved tinkering. He had worked with my grandfather's clock before now, and was not a little proud of his success in setting it right when took a stubborn fit and went wrong as it did occasionally.

"You see, ma'am," he said, "now and again the mainspring gets out of order. Nothing ever does go right, when the mainspring's not what it should be."

He had hit the nail on the head. From talk about the clock we got to talk about the man. John told me frankly that he'd made a hard fight but he'd been beaten.

"And where are you going?" I asked. "Straight to the devil!" he answered, like a flash. "I've tired out my friends, I've tired out myself, I've tired out my wife. The sooner I'm dead and done with it the better."

"John Bentley," I said, "there's one you haven't tired out, and he isn't going to let the devil have you. The Lord Jesus Christ claims you, John, claims you for his man, his soldier, his servant. You can't resist that claim. Christ's going to save you, and you've got to yield to him and be saved."

"I've no will left," he moaned. "The Son of Man came to seek and save just such as you. He has a new will to put into you." John Bentley, will you resist, or will you consent to be saved?"

"Lord, be merciful to me a sinner," cried John, falling on his knees beside the tall old clock, that ticked, and ticked, as the solemn moments sped. * * *

That's ten years ago. John has never tasted liquor since. The Bentleys are happy and prosperous.

The Cataracts of the Nile.

In the advance of the Anglo-Egyptian Army toward Dongola, the troops are under the necessity of going considerable distances by water. This is not an easy matter, for the river Nile, for hundreds of miles, is little else than a mass of rocks and rapids. Our photograph of the First Cataract (on the opposite page), shows how difficult must be the task of taking even small steamers and gunboats up such a narrow channel. One gunboat, the El-Teb, when taken up through the Second Cataract, had to be temporarily stripped of her guns, the only weight left being her coal supply. 500 soldiers on the east bank pulled at the hawsers and on board the gunboat men regulating her course with fenders and pushing-off poles. All communications between those on board and the men on the bank had to be carried on by signal, owing to the noise of the rapids.

In a Laos Hospital.

How Healing for the Body and Salvation for the Soul Have Been Brought Within the Reach of a Strange People.

ONE of the most interesting, though little known countries of the world is the Laos country, which lies to the north of Siam, and is separated from China by an arm of Tonquin on the northeast and an arm of Burmah on the northwest. By the courtesy of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions we are privileged to give on this page a picture of the Royal Temple which stands on a broad street running north and south through the great city of Chieng Mai. The face of the temple is covered with gold embellished with bits of mirror and colored mica. The horns upon the roof are gilded and hung with little bells that ring sweetly with every breeze that stirs. When the morning sun shines upon the gorgeous temple the reflection is glorious. Within its walls a great altar is placed at the rear, upon which is seated a colossal image of Buddha covered with gold and robed in rich garments. The curious tower rising to the left of the temple is called a Pra-ch-dee. It contains relics of Buddha—possibly a tooth or a few hairs—and is venerated by the Laos. It is built of sand and bricks, the exterior covered with mortar and outside whitened or gilded.

In this Laos country Dr. James W. McKean is doing a noble work for Christ, and many a poor heathen has had reason to bless God for the blessings he has received for body and soul through the labors of this devoted missionary. In a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD received a few days ago, Dr. McKean thus writes of the country and tells the story of two of the patients who have come under his care:

This whole land is full of both physical and spiritual sickness and death. A very broad field for the exercise of the healing art, combined with the widest possible opportunity for the proclamation of the Gospel lies before any Christian physician who is willing to give himself to such a work.

Two of our recent cases will show both the need of the work and the benefits of it. One of these was the case of a nobleman at Miung Sing: This man was a person of some wealth and influence in the province where he resided, being one of the governor's chief men. Shortly after having built a large dwelling house he was taken with a very painful disease. Fearing that he had in some way offended the spirits in the building of the house, he made frequent and valuable offerings to them but all to no purpose. His disease growing more painful, he tore down his fine house, hoping thereby to placate the spirits, but this also failed. Native medicine gave no relief and the man was in despair.

After he had suffered four years, he met a man who had formerly been afflicted with the same disease and who had been cured by an operation in the mission hospital in Cheung Mai. To Cheung Mai he resolved to go. But he met many obstacles. Cheung Mai was very far away. He was so ill that travel was almost impossible. There lay before him a long journey over mountains, through forest and jungle and across many rivers, the great Cambodia being one of them. His friends tried to dissuade him. The princess tried to prevent his going, and even the governor refused to give his consent. But he was resolved. As he said, he "set his heart" to go. So selling much of his property and getting together seven hundred rupees, a large amount of ready money for a man in his province, he set out for Cheung Mai.

He was too ill to walk so must hire men to carry him on a litter. Several days after leaving home he learned that the men who carried him were opium eaters. A few days later under threat of being deserted in the forest he was compelled to yield seventy rupees of his precious seven hundred for the purchase of opium for his men. One night while sitting by his camp-fire, unable to sleep on account of pain, his carriers and servants having retired, robbers sprang into the camp and putting out the lights, robbed him of his guns, ammunition and other valuables. On account of his severe illness he was compelled to make long and frequent stops on the way, so that when at last he entered the mission hospital in Cheung Mai he had been a whole year on the road and his seven hundred rupees were entirely gone. He was welcomed to the hospital as befitted his office and his need as well as his faith and persistence in seeking the only hope of relief. After preliminary treatment he was submitted to an operation with the very gratifying result of a complete cure. He had been a great sufferer. He told me that for five years he had not been able to sleep with any degree of comfort, but that every single night he had sat on his bed racked with pain until exhausted nature claimed a few short hours of disturbed and unrefreshing sleep. It was a great joy to us as well as to him that he was so entirely relieved from all suffering. During his stay of several months he was daily instructed in the Christian religion. Learned in the Buddhist faith he readily comprehended the superiority of Christianity and seemed to receive it gladly. When he left for his distant home he professed to be a believer in Christ.

Other cases of interest might be mentioned. One in particular is that of a man who had long suffered from mental disease. All disturbances of mental functions are here attributed to spirits. This man surely seemed possessed of the devil. So violent had he become that his friends had removed him from his house and had bound him with two chains to the posts of the rice granary. His brother who was a noted spirit doctor, had tried all his charms and incantations for the poor man's relief, but without avail.

It happened—aye, did not He who orders all things cause it to happen?—that two of our native evangelists were teaching in this village. Indeed, relatives of the sick man, including the spirit doctor, were receiving instruction in the Christian religion. These evangelists, taking pity on the poor maniac, applied for medicine for his relief. It must be confessed that it was with little hope of cure that medicine was given. A few days later, however, the evangelists reported that after taking the medicine for two days he was so much improved that his chains were removed. After continuing the treatment for several weeks the man was apparently cured. A few months later we had the joy of seeing this man, clothed and in his right mind, received into the visible church, together with his whole family including his brother, the spirit doctor.

Almost a whole year has elapsed. The man is well and to all appearances is a devout and consistent disciple of the Lord. A few days ago, at a Sabbath service at which this man was present, the native Christians were remarking upon his cure and agreed in saying that the divine power manifestly exercised therein closely resembled that exercised in the apostolic times, when Satan was cast out of men's hearts and bodies to make place for the spirit of truth.

Brotherhood.

WE can express our interest in other Christians by a simple nod of the head when we meet them on the street. You say, "There are Christians connected with our church I cannot speak to, because I have never been introduced." You dare not accost them because of the conventionalities of society. We must come upon a higher platform than that. We must remember that we are sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. We must feel that as it would be a very strange thing for two brothers, born of the same parents and nurtured at the same fireside, to pass each other from time to time on the street without any personal recognition; so, and far more than so, it is outrageous when two men, children of the same Heavenly Father, having been seated at the same communion table, and baptized by the same Holy Spirit, and on their way to the same home, do not recognize each other, whether according to the ordinary laws of society they have a right to express such recognition or not. If you are sure that you are a child of God, and you are sure of the fact that the man you meet in the street is a friend of God, you have a right to give him your brotherly sympathy by a nod of the head. God made the muscles of the neck so pliable, and the bones of the neck so easily adjusted to a bow, that he intended we should recognize those who are our brothers in Jesus Christ. And when you go along the street, let there be a lighting up of the face and a gleam in the eye and a congeniality in your manner for all those who love Christ. Let it not be an outward and hypocritical demonstration; but from a heart warmed up with love for God and love for his kingdom, bow to every Christian.

Another way in which we can culture Christian sympathy, and demonstrate it, and make it practical, is by a shake of the hand. We do not refer to an unmeaning touch of the hand, to an indefinite sprawling out of the fingers; but we mean one warm, decided, positive grip which seems to say, "Here is my regard—my help, if you want it—my sympathy, my brotherhood." If secret societies have their signals—and it is stated that when one of them meets with another, they shake hands in a certain way, and in the same order recognizes another by some peculiar sign. We have some grip by which a child of God, who has within him the secret of the Lord, shall recognize those who are of the same brotherhood, of the same secret society? For the secret of the Lord belongs only to those who fear him; and whenever you find a man in that brotherhood, give him the grip.

A Wide Gospel.

IF it had been possible, religion would have been monopolized. Some would have said: "Let us have all this to ourselves—no publicans, no plebeians, no lazzaroni, no converted pickpockets. We will ride toward heaven on fierce chargers, our feet in golden stirrups. Grace for lords, and dukes, and duchesses, and counts. Let Napoleon and his marshals come in, but not the common soldier that fought under him. Let the Girards and Barings come in, but not the stevedores that unloaded their cargoes, or the men who kept their books." Heaven would have been a glorified Windsor Castle, or Tuilleries, or Vatican; and exclusive people would have strutted through the golden gates to all eternity. Thank God, there is mercy for the poor! The great Dr. John Mason preached over a hundred times the same sermon; and the text was: "To the poor the Gospel is preached." Lazarus went up, while Dives went down; and there are candidates for imperial splendor in the back alleys, and by the peat fire of the Irish shanty. King Jesus set up his throne in a manger, and made a resurrection day for the poor widow of Nain, and swung the gate of heaven wide open. The nations of the earth will one day come into this refuge. The windows of heaven will be opened; God's trumpet of salvation will sound, and China will come from its tea-fields and rice-harvests, and lift itself up into the light. India will come forth; the chariots of salvation jostling to pieces her Juggernauts. Freezing Greenland and sweltering Abyssinia will, side by side, press into the kingdom; and transformed Bornesian cannibals will preach of the resurrection of the missionaries they have slain. The glory of Calvary will tinge the top of the Pyrenees; and Lebanon cedars shall clap their hands; and by one swing of the sickle Christ shall harvest nations for the skies. I sing of a world to be redeemed. In the rush of the winds that set the forests in motion, like giants wrestling on the hills. I see the tossing up of the triumphal branches that shall wave all along the line of our King as he comes to take empire. In the stormy diapason of the ocean's organ, and the more gentle strains that in the calm come sounding up from the crystal and jasper keys at the beach, I hear the prophecy: "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of God as the waters fill the sea." Come in, Black Hottentot and snow-white Caucasian; come in, mitred official and diseased beggar; let all the world come in. Room in Castle Jesus! Sound it through all lands; sound it by all tongues. Let sermons preach it, and bells chime it, and pencils sketch it, and processions celebrate it.

Get Them in!

GET men into the Kingdom of God. Who cares about the way you get them in? I went to the Adirondacks with a hunting and fishing apparatus loaned me by a friend. The apparatus was worth five hundred dollars. If the trout and deer of Saranac Lake and John Brown's tract could have understood my baggage, they would have been very apprehensive. Such reels! Such bait boxes! Such cartridges! Such Bradford flies! Such pocket flasks for soda water and lemonade! Suffice it to say that I did not interfere with the piscatory or zoological world. While I was laboriously getting ready, a mountaineer with an old blunderbuss and three deer. I found that splendid apparatus did not imply execution. What is true in the woods is true in the Church. All our elaborate and costly theological apparatus is a failure, if we cannot catch souls.

Returning to Work.

NOW that the holiday months are over, it will not be amiss to consider some facts regarding holidays, and their inevitable sequence of buckling to work again. To many who have been wandering amid the glamor of foreign cities, or else shut apart in lonely unplanted places, the first sensations of a return to business must be that they are out of time and tune with their surroundings. Yet this is a mood a thoughtful man may well encourage for an hour or two; for it will allow him, before stepping back into his real position, to see it morally, as he never can see it, when in the full tide of active life. If his aims and ambitions are impure, he must feel how low he has to stoop, in order to grasp what has drifted away from him; and the very act should be a revelation and a reproof. If his work is noble, and influential for good, he cannot but realize its importance, as he steps back into his place and his opportunities.

For after all, holidays are desirable, more for their moral, than for their physical necessity. Physically, this necessity is far overrated. The common talk about our working too hard is just a little bit of pretence. Few people really work hard; if they do, it agrees with them; for it is very rarely indeed, the intellectual power is disproportionate to the physical power. Let anyone in a good, honest hurry, walk down Wall Street at high noon, and he will be quickly irritated at the pottering crowd of professedly busy men, encumbering the sidewalks. Legitimate business, in the ordinary business hours, will not injure anyone; it is only when a man's business is studying the ups and downs of stocks, and staking money on the result—it is only business that swings constantly between ruin and fortune, that overworks and fits a man for permanent holidays. Therefore, it is a libel on the holy sacrament of Work, to call Anxiety by its name; real honest work, being of all influences, the most serene, soothing and consoling. No one perhaps realizes this until the day comes when he fears his work is over. Then, there is a sense of such hopeless regret, as no other loss in life can awaken.

Which of us would like to live in a world where it was always holiday? Thank God for daily work! It is daily blessing! Thank God that he reaches us good things with our own hands! Thank God that the holiday-makers in European cities, and American woods, are all turning homeward, and workward again, and that mostly with satisfaction. For though they may have wandered amid the inspiring relics of a splendid and heroic past, and even trod on ground linked with immortal deeds, it is not these things, it is the routine of a regular and a busy life, which is the native air of all the solid virtues.

And what of those who have had no travel, and no holiday—who have been forced by financial circumstances to stay at home? Blessed are they who have had the courage to do this, rather than to borrow money to travel with, and leave their debts unpaid, and carry their cares with them! There is little doubt that those who have had the honor, and strength of character, to trust to their own hearths and homes, have had many little unexpected pleasures—such pleasures as are always coming to those who look for, and expect them; "Godsends" which have stolen upon them unawares: which they did not plan for, which cost them little, and left no regrets behind them. So that, though those who have travelled this summer may have done well, it is possible that those who have stayed at home may have done better. They have probably learned to make happiness in unaccustomed conditions; learned to cheerfully "do without," to run themselves into new shapes; and to make the best of small pleasures; and to throw off that care,

Though wisdom show
That with superficial London leads the day,
And when God sends a cheerful hour, refrains

Well then, both those who have wandered far away, and those who have stayed at home with honor and duty, may alike thank God that the holidays are over, and that they have their work and their place in a world which is not indifferent either to their absence or their return. Holidays, or no holidays, such men never repine; they outlook shadows; they turn necessity into glorious joy they breathe on every event the perfume of hope; and amid pleasant yesterday and confident to-morrows,

Travel on Life's common way,
In cheerful gladness.

BRIEF NOTES.

A Christian Endeavor Society has formed in San Francisco of rescued Chinese girls. Their interest in the convention next week shown by their plans for a reception to the delegates and their pledge of fifty dollars for conv expenses.

Rev. George C. Needham, D. D., is giving lectures on the Epistles in the Sixth Avenue Church, Brooklyn, every Friday evening during month and next. He also preaches in the church each Lord's Day.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of Canada will hold their first national convention at Ottawa, October 1-5. Special meetings will be held at Aylmer, Quebec, where Dr. F. E. Clark, President of the United Society, was born.

Mr. Laurier, the New Premier of Canada, announces that he will submit and support legislation at the next session of Parliament to permit the electors of the Dominion to defer whether or not all traffic in liquor in the Dominion shall be prohibited.

Evangelist E. P. Telford's Friends will glad to learn that his meetings at Newcastle-on-Tyne have been the means of bringing in a multitude of souls. He expects to hold meetings during the month at Manchester, Cardiff, Hartlepool, Gateshead, and other towns.

London has Among its Roman Catholic priests Prince Max, a nephew of the King of Saxony. He renounced his rights in the line of succession to the throne to enter the priesthood. His action caused genuine surprise, as he was a thorough of the world. He is now working in Whitechapel the poorest district in London.

A Correspondent of Marshalltown, Ia reports that the services conducted in that town by Evangelist Williams are increasing in interest and that in spite of criticisms by the press there, and stirring sermons of the evangelist are attracting large audiences and are blessed to the conversion of many souls.

The American Methodist Episcopal Church and the English Wesleyans have agreed to a plan for the evangelization of Germany. They will take the name of the American branch of the church. This will bring under African control twenty-nine churches with an aggregate of 2,300 members.

St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, carrying on a cosmopolitan work in addition to English services. It has now a Chinese, Armenian and Swedish Mission. The Chinese preachers Jin Fuyei Moy, M. D., the Armenian is Rev. Yohannian, and the Swedish Rev. H. Holmgren.

Louis Rhead who is Famous in the American world of art is quoted by the "Congregationalist" saying to his brother artists: "You will never good art of any sort if you do not believe in a Creator who made this world. Artists think they can lead immoral lives destroy their promises. They go to the dogs, scowling, and then they die."

The Congregational Church of Simsbury, Conn., is about to celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of its organization. Liberal friends have contributed to a suitable celebration. One of them has given the church a new $2,000 organ, and they have paid for the erection of a handsome church and for the restoration and renovation of the interior of the church.

The Italian Evangelical Mission in New York has been doing a fine work during the summer. A. Arrighi has held services in the Broome St. Tabernacle which have been largely attended by the Italians. A lady interested in the work has offered to give ten thousand dollars toward the erection of an Italian church if sufficient funds can be raised to build a suitable edifice free of debt.

The Death of Dr. John M. Stevenson, formerly Secretary of the American Tract Society, comes as a personal bereavement into a large circle of homes. During the time that he had charged the Society's benevolent work he came into contact with Christian people through all the land and in a host of friends. Dr. Stevenson had attained eighty-fourth year. He retired from office a year ago.

Bishop Joyce of the Methodist Episcopal Church has been holding conference in far Writing from Nagasaki, he says: "The conference was a good one in every way. We had a revival of the first day to the last hour. preachers have gone to their work happy and hopeful, and with a strong faith that God will give them great victories during the year. We sail for Yokohama to-morrow."

In the Island of Madagascar, prior to the French occupation, the London Missionary Society had fifteen hundred congregations, most of them worshipping in substantial churches. There were 1,000 church members and the entire census persons attending Protestant worship was 20,000. There were forty high-church ministers in the island. The population of the island is about four million of whom nine-tenths are heathen.

A Local Journal Reports an interesting celebration at Babylon, N.Y. It was at the third birthday of Ex-Sheriff Stephen Wilson of the town. Mr. Wilson, an ancient Methodist, at his younger days collected the funds for the erection of the first church of that denomination in the town. In spite of his many three years, his right eye is good and his step firm. He holds the office of tax-collector and performs the duties unattended.

The Mission Services in Lower Atlantic, Brooklyn, to which reference was made in our column recently, are being greatly blessed. A Mission was commenced by some Christians in one of the dry-goods houses of the city, who were concerned for the poor and ignorant and uneducated section. The Mission is attended by some laymen and various reports. Rev. B. R. Smith, of the De Kalb Avenue M. E. Church, has accepted the presidency of the League which has been formed to take charge of the Mission.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Royal Betrothal.

PUBLIC announcement is made in European journals of an approaching royal marriage. The Prince of Naples, the only son and heir of the King of Italy, is to be married in November Princess Helene, a daughter of the Montenegro. The young man is seven years of age, and has been years seeking a bride. The eligible royal birth, to whom overtures made, for various reasons declined, though it included the prospect of a Princess Helene, too, has had monial disappointments. She was the dowager Empress of Russia, had her educated with great care in the Imperial Palace of St. Petersburg, so that she should be the bride of the present Emperor. Her hope was dashed by the powerful Pan-Slavist Russia, which was strongly opposed to the Czarewitch marrying a German and Lutheran Princess. In spite of wishes of his mother, and of the opposition of his subjects, Nicholas refused to marry Princess Helene. Deeply mortified, she had to renege her father's dreary court at Cetinje during her stay at St. Petersburg. She developed into a very beautiful and stately figure, with a wealth of dark hair and dark, flashing eyes. After her return, an offer of marriage to her from King Alexander of Serbia was promptly rejected. The manners and objectionable habits of the young king were repulsive to the girl whose delicate tastes and preferences had been cultivated under the personal supervision of the charming and accomplished Czarina. But her life must have been all unbecomingly. Her father, Prince of Montenegro, a brave man, whose court was frequented by drunkards and men like himself. He is the brave people over the rules. The little city contains less than a hundred thousand population; they are a fierce and brave people whom the Sultan has often tried, but failed, to subdue. The Prince receives the largest part of his income as a stipend from the Czar, to whom, in the war with Turkey, he proved a valuable ally. The Prince has nine children, the Princess Helene, who is three years old, is third. One of her sisters is married to a Russian Duke and the other to a German Duke. In point of rank, she is making a marriage that is making a marriage, however, it cannot be called a match, as, while she is six years old, her future husband is less than ten and is exceedingly frail and delicate during the interval before her marriage will change her religion. She was brought up in the Greek Church in the expectation that she would be the wife of the Czar, but now that she is to be the wife of a Roman Catholic Prince, she is to be transferred into that church. The transfer is not considered, in royal circles, a disgrace to pay when a crown is involved. In humbler homes a change of religion would not be made except on conviction. A Princess is expected to change her religion as a matter of policy.

it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we are not corruptible. (1. Cor. 9: 25).

Correspondent's Complaint.

Proceedings have been taken in a newspaper in Berlin and another in Vienna by the Correspondent of the Christian Herald, whose dispatches from Constantinople have caused surprise wherever they have been read. The dispatches appeared to be written by some one anxious to defend the Sultan and to make excuses for the hideous massacres which that miscreant has authorized. They retailed the false charges made by Turks against the Armenians, and minimized the cruel wrongs which the latter have suffered. The German and Austrian papers criticized the dispatches and declared that the correspondent had misrepresented himself to the Sultan, and had incited him to take still more severe measures against the Armenians and added: "He thus bears some of the responsibility for the massacres." The correspondent complained that he was libelled and insisted that the journals retract their charges. There is no conduct, howsoever vile, that will justify a newspaper, or a person, in making false statements or insinuations; but when people eulogize what is evil and champion the cause of the tyrant and the oppressor, they should not be surprised if their motives are suspected and a dishonorable construction is put on their actions. Christians in all walks of life are warned that an expression of sympathy with wrongdoers makes the sympathizer a partner with them in responsibility.

He that biddeth him Godspeed is a partaker of his evil deeds. (11. John 11.)

Doomed Towns.

A press dispatch from Ontonagon, Mich., describing the destruction of that town by fire gives emphatic warning against the mode of building adopted there. It says that the town had adequate fire protection be necessary to clear the ground of underbrush and stumps and even of the great branching roots of the pine, filled with resin, which carry the fire underneath the surface of the soil. Analogous measures are needed in human nature to save it from destruction by the ravages of sin. Everything on which temptation feeds must be eliminated.

Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? He that walketh righteously and speaketh uprightly and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil. (Isa. 32: 14, 15).

Contagion in the Cup.

A warning has been given to the Board of Health at Newark, N. J., by an official connected with the Bureau of Contagious Diseases. It appears that there has been an increase of late in the number of cases of diphtheria and other contagious diseases in the city and an investigation was ordered. Among the precautions suggested was one affecting the schools. The Superintendent of the Health Department advised the Board to remove the drinking cups and dippers from the water supply in the schools and to require each child to name. It appears that two brothers came from Germany with their families in the early thirties of the century and settled in the town. One of the brothers is still living there. He is over ninety years old. His wife is only two years younger. The couple have had ten sons and two daughters, all of whom have married and reared large families. Four of the sons are fathers of twelve children each. The head of the family recently became a great-grandfather. His brother, who is dead, also left numerous descendants. Within a circle of two miles there are one hundred and sixty persons of the same name. It has become, says the reporter, quite a difficult matter now to find a given name for a new arrival in the family, that is not already borne by some members of the family, and it needs a prodigious memory to avoid duplications which cause confusion. People who are fond of puzzling themselves about the conditions of life beyond the grave have sometimes asked whether similar confusion will not arise in heaven when different generations of a family are there and there must be many persons of the same name. They forget that provision is made for that difficulty.

I will give unto him a white stone and on the stone a new name written which no man knoweth save he that receiveth it. (Rev. 2: 17.)

Diamonds sold Cheap.

A profitable bargain which was spoiled by the police was made by a Williamsburg, N. Y., jeweller last week. A wealthy lady had married a widower who had one son, a lad of about sixteen years. As she had no reason to suspect this stepson of vicious propensities, she was not so careful with her valuables as she would have been if she had known him better. The youth recently needed money for some boyish indulgence, and not being able to obtain it, he took a necklace and a pair of diamond ear-rings belonging to his stepmother. The ear-rings were single diamonds and the necklace was set with the same stones. Together, the owner says, they were worth fully five hundred dollars. The youth, however, knew nothing of their value. He pledged the necklace in one pawnshop for a dollar, and the ear-rings in another for seventy-five cents. Then he sold the tickets to a jeweller for fifteen cents. When the theft was traced to him, he frankly confessed what he had done with the jewels. The police went to the store where the tickets had been sold, and found that the purchaser had just removed the stones and was melting the settings. It seems almost incredible that even a boy should not have known that the jewels were too valuable to be given up for so paltry a sum. If the denizens of the other world know what goes on in this, they probably feel like amazement when they see men display such dense ignorance of the value of their souls that they sacrifice them in the pursuit of wealth or pleasure getting nothing in return, but things which perish in the using—an ignorance infinitely more inexcusable and a recklessness infinitely more disastrous than that the boy displayed as to the value of the jewels he had stolen.

What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? (Matt. 16: 26.)

A Patriarchal Couple.

A newspaper reporter who had an assignment in Indiana recently, visited a remarkable township. He found the majority of the people related to each other, and the greater part of them bearing the same —as nearly adequate as possible. The full department of New York or Chicago, with all their steamers and all their brave men, could not have saved Ontonagon after the flames had caught among the sixty-five million feet of dry lumber piled along both banks of the river. Possibly the destruction was delayed half an hour by the heroic work of the village and mill firemen—that is the utmost that can be said, and it is much to say when the nature of the fight is considered. The lumber mill towns of the pine districts are, as a rule, built not only through lumber, but of lumber, and upon sawdust also, in many cases. The buildings burn in an incredibly short time, but were they of brick or stone they would go down almost as quickly, with millions of feet of dry lumber behind them to feed the flames. At Ontonagon the fine three-story brick stores were apparently burned almost as quickly as their wooden neighbors. There is probably but one measure that can protect the lumber towns from forest fires. Were a strip of ground at least half a mile in width cleared thoroughly about the entire place immunity might be secured. The mere cutting down of the trees would not suffice, as it would bring his own cup or glass. He said that there was no more likely way of disseminating diphtheria than that of drinking from a mug or dipper after it had been used by a child who was suffering from the disease in its early stages. The microbes of the disease adhered to the edge of the cup and passed to the lips of the next child who might use it. Doubtless the superintendent is right, and it would be wise to take the precaution. It may save some from contracting the disease. It would be well if there were a similar dread of another contagion, which does infinitely more mischief and which involves a far greater number in danger. More to be dreaded than the lips of a diphtheretic child are the lips of those foul-mouthed persons of whom the Bible says:

Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips. (Rom. 3: 13).

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Dwellers by the Sea.

The "Beach-Combers," and their Lonely, Precarious Lives Along the Coast—Wreckage their means of Livelihood.

ON almost every habitable sea-coast of the globe, there is to be found a class of people who have received the general appellation of "beach-combers." In some instances, dangerous stretches of coast have acquired a sinister reputation, the charge being made that the "beach-combers" there were little better than human vultures who prowled among the rocks and hovered over the sandy beaches watching for any unfortunate vessel which a gale might have driven into a position of danger. Along the coasts of Southern Europe, at certain points of the coast of Great Britain, along the shores of the West Indies, and in not a few of the islands of the Pacific, there are localities that are still pointed out as having once been the resort of "beach-combers" who took part in many a tragedy of the ocean. Tradition tells that many an unfortunate shipwrecked crew, falling into the hands of those lawless creatures, met a fate more cruel than that of engulphment by the angry waves, and that many a good ship was plundered and stripped bare to the hulk, and left with her bones to bleach on the jagged rocks.

But a vessel might almost search the world over for the old type of "beach-comber" to-day in vain. Everywhere, the patrol of the coasts is now so thorough and so general that it would be next to impossible for a lawless community of "wreckers to exist." Besides, the number of light-houses, signal stations and life-saving stations has been multiplied at all the points where danger to vessels is apprehended.

There are still many who live by the wreckage of the sea. Along our Atlantic seaboard, down by the Florida Keys, and on the shores of the Gulf there are many lonely cabins, whose occupants are "beach-combers," subsisting upon the tribute of the waves. There are localities where the countless eddies and currents of the ocean deposit the debris of innumerable wrecks, frequently casting up on the beaches valuables that are sure to be redeemed by the owners. Still, the income of the "beach-comber," is a very precarious one.

Our photograph shows a "Comber's" cabin and its surroundings on the New Jersey coast. The aged couple, who have probably spent all their lives in the same neighborhood, are thrifty and respectable folks of their class. Their little frame cabin, with its red brick chimney, affords but a slight protection against the storms that sweep over the sea and break against the mainland; but all weather is alike to these "children of the surf," and they love the storms best of all—because they bring them a harvest of wreckage. What with the diligent patrol of the beach, and the fact that one needs to be half fisherman half agriculturist in order to get enough to eat, such a life can hardly be called one of leisure. Yet it seems to hold a singular fascination for those who enter it, probably because it has in it so much that savors of uncertainty and adventure.

Crossing the River.

A young lady, Miss Annie Whitney of Germantown, Phila. She writes: "In one of our Homes in the northwestern section of our city, there dwelt an old lady, who had been an inmate of our great Rebellion her husband was killed in the battle of Gettysburg. The old lady the idea taking possession of her mind was that she must cross the water to meet him. After making her toilet each morning, she would put on her bonnet and keep it on all day. When she first entered the Home she would wander away frequently and sometimes get lost, so that it became necessary to keep her in her room by means of a gate. At any time during the day, one going through the corridors would see an old lady with silvery locks and a sweet, patient smile on her face, standing by the gate, with her bonnet on her head, and a little basket in her hand. On speaking to place: "The party assembled in the large hall looking at the seats of the councilors, that of the president and the throne of the young queen, Wilhelmina. It struck one of the gentlemen that we had among us a girl just about the queen's age, so he came up to her, offered her his arm, and said with a profound bow, 'May I conduct your Majesty to the throne?' The girl got up, allowed him to lead her up the steps, and took her seat on the throne with a charming modesty and a wonderful absence of self-consciousness. After the ubiquitous camera had done its work, another gentleman put the finishing touch to the scene by coming up to the girl, putting his hand on her shoulder and saying: 'I arrest you as a usurper. Come with me to the dungeons,' and we all followed the queen and her jailer."

It was a daring adventure and in other lands and other days might have caused serious trouble; but it only goes to show tributes gifts to Brahmins, and is considered the bridegroom's presence in male relation. The bridegroom's Majestis then hands a package containing bridal dress to the bridegroom, who sends it to the bride. The girl makes bow and receives the dress. When is being done the ladies assemble for the customary applause. The guests then treated to a feast.

The Little Ones He Bless

I WONDER if ever the children Who were blessed by the Master Forgot he had made them his treasure The dear little lambs of his fold. I wonder if, angry and wilful, They wandered afar and astray, The children whose feet had been guided So safe and so soon in the way.

One would think that the mothers at Soft smoothing the silk-tangled hair Aud low leaning down to the murmur Of sweet, childish voices in prayer, Oft bade the small pleaders to listen, If haply again they might hear The words of the gentle Redeemer Borne swift to the reverent ear.

And my heart cannot cherish the fancy That ever those children went wrong And were lost from the peace and the song Shut out from the feast and the song To the day of gray hairs they remember I think, how the hands that were raised Were laid on their heads when Christ "Of such is the kingdom of heaven.

He has said it to you, little darling, Who spell it in God's Word to-day; You, too, may be sorry for sinning, You also believe and obey; And 'twill grieve the dear Saviour in h If one little child shall go wrong— Be lost from the fold and the shelter, Shut out from the feast and the song

CHILDREN AND TEACHERS

VACATION days are over, and young folks are back again to studies. If teachers could realize what they hold in they would surely feel the import of their responsibility, and many of them feel it keenly and carry out into action the high sense of this responsibility. Were it not so, then far better the children should be kept from learning; taught in schools; better they should know nor care that the verb must with its subject in person and number that numbers may be tortured and added to and taken from.

Companionship at school, writes servant teacher, is one of the advantages of schools over private teaching, but shall it be guarded and guided? Even most careful so often fail, and mistakes done before it is suspected. If twenty years of life are protected and strewn, much must be trusted in that that good will drive out evil, because is no place for it; there will be no where there is love, and no coarse thoughts where there are pure and ones.

Teachers have a great responsibility the formation of child character. mould the lives of their pupils to tent that is not always fully appreciated. A lady famous as one of the most and lovable among the leaders of the Ar society says: "If I have been able to accomplish anything in life, it is due to word spoken to me in the right way when I was a child, by my teacher. exceptionally plain in personal appearance. One day my teacher found me saying, 'O, madame, I am so ugly!' I said, 'Presently she took me to her and said, 'I have a present for you, a ring, a scaly, coarse lump, covered earth. 'Plant it and water it and sun for a week or two.' I planted and watched it carefully; the green came first, and at last the golden Ja lily, the first I had ever seen. My teacher came to share my delight. 'Ah!' she said significantly, 'who would believe so beauty and fragrance were shut up in little rough ugly thing!' It was the time that it ever occurred to me in spite of my ugly face, I, too, might be to win friends and make myself beautiful in the world."

This little incident may furnish as to the influence the teacher can if she chooses, in the development of character among the children under her her each one was invariably met with the same answer, and the same sweet smile: "I'm going across the river to-day; husband's waiting for me."

"So the weeks rolled into months, and the months into years, and still the old lady waited at the gate, until one morning the nurse, on entering the room, found the patient weaker than usual, so she summoned her friends. They entered the room soon after, to find the old lady sitting very still, with her bonnet on her head and her little basket by her side. Her faithful vigil was ended forever. She had crossed the river.

A Moment on a Throne.

One young American girl, at least, has the proud distinction of being able to say she was seated on a throne. It was only a moment. A party of Americans were visiting the Palace of the Hague, Holland. One of the number thus describes the incident which took place: "The children of the Western Republic look upon royalty as something of a tinsel show after all, and that true royalty has no need of thrones and diadems."

A Bridegroom's Gift.

In Travancore, India, there is a singular wedding custom which has prevailed there for many generations. Before the ceremony, the bridegroom proceeds to the Arapura—the most important apartment in the house—accompanied by his relations and friend. He makes obeisance to his father, Karanaven, and other elders present, distributes presents to a few Brahmins, and installs himself in the orthodox fashion on the appointed seat. One of his kinsmen (known as Machampis) sits by him with the cloths to be presented to the bride—the cloths being folded, wrapped in silk, and placed on a plate. Meanwhile the bride arrives, makes obeisance to her mother and other female relations, dis-

The Atonement.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning October 4.
1b. 9:11-28.

WHY we believe in the Atonement is not a superfluous or unnecessary question. In these days the doctrine is spoken of as "the doctrine of the shambles," and is stigmatized as unreasonable, incredible, and a doctrine dishonoring God. But to the great majority of Christians it is a doctrine inseparably precious, the fountain of their hope and peace. We believe in it because to us it appears to be a fact. Even if it is as repulsive as it is presented to be we would be justified in denying it. Now the plain meaning of Christ's own words uttered in many forms is that his death was necessary to the redemption of men. He said he laid down his life for sheep; that no man took it from him, but he laid it of himself. The Apostles taught the same doctrine with an emphasis and conviction that could have come from a very clear belief that Christ had declared it. Peter and Paul reiterate what made it the cardinal theme of their preaching and teaching. Our own experience confirms the truth of the doctrine. We find it is the way to peace, the way to peace. It satisfies the craving of the soul. It relieves the dread we have of punishment for past sins. There is no system of atonement, ancient or modern, that will do it so effectively. To the soul that realizes its guilt and the impossibility of undoing the past, the doctrine of the atonement is as the one and only satisfactory way of cleansing and rehabilitation. Objections which are made to the doctrine are not so strong as they appear at first. It is urged that as we require an atonement for our sins we are willing to forgive God who is much better than we, would not demand it. These are not parallel. God is a very different position toward us from that we are toward each other. A man might forgive his brother striking him a cruel blow, but the father would have nothing to say about it. The sinner must be punished and a reluctant father might be to punish him, he would be recreant to his duty and neglected to do so. When a persecutor wishes to withdraw from a prosecution and the wrongdoer goes untried, the judge frequently refuses to permit it. When a life, who has been beaten by a cruel husband, tearfully begs him and pleads that he not be punished, he may be forgiven, but he is not cleansed of his guilt. The forgiveness of an injured wife leaves him disgraced, and his conscience is the heavy load of misery which is all the greater because of the magnanimity of his victim. It is a hard truth that none can forgive sins but God only. No man can redeem his brother. As we cannot place ourselves, even in imagination, in the position God takes toward the world, it is presumptuous to say on what terms he can forgive sin. Still more presumptuous is it for us to think of the sacrifice of Christ which he offered, as unnecessary and to cavil at it, dishonoring to God. Like Namaan at the house of Elisha, and the serpent-bit Israelites in the desert, our duty is to accept the terms that are offered, assured that God who is infinitely wise has good reason for all that he does.

CHRIST THE WAY.

A MID life's wild commotion.
Where nought the heart can cheer,
Who points beyond its ocean
To yonder brighter sphere?

Our feeble footsteps guiding.
When from the path we stray,
Who leads to bliss abiding?
Christ is our only Way.

Who fills our hearts with gladness
That none can take away?
Who shows us, midst our sadness
The distant realms of day?

Mid fears of death assailing.
Who stills the heart's wild strife?
'Tis Christ! our friend unfailing,
The Way, the Truth, the Life.

JOY IN BELIEVING.

SOMETIMES a light surprises
The Christian while he sings;
It is the Lord who rises
With healing in his wings.

When comforts are declining,
He grants the soul again
A season of clear shining,
To cheer it after rain.

Though vine nor fig-tree neither
Their wonted fruit shall bear,
Though all the field shall wither,
Nor flocks nor herds be there:

Yet God the same abiding,
His praise shall tune my voice;
For, while in him confiding,
I cannot but rejoice.

The Prophetic Parables.

The Period Prefigured in the Parable of the Leaven, and its Characteristics.

BY REV. GEORGE H. PEMBER, M.A.

IN this Parable we see before us a woman hiding leaven in three measures of fine meal; so that the process of fermentation commences, and silently proceeds, until the whole is leavened. The interpretation of the scene depends, of course, on the meaning to be given to leaven, which has been commonly supposed to represent pure Christianity. But such an explanation is manifestly wrong, for leaven is an unmistakable symbol of sin and corruption; and, in the New Testament, the Lord gives some hints respecting special forms of this evil by warning his disciples to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Herodians—three Jewish sects which are never without their counterparts in the professing Church. The agent in the scene is a woman—the usual symbol of a system or Church; and the fact that she is secretly corrupting the fine flour, acting like the enemy who sowed tares upon the wheat, proves her to be the false Church. The leaven is corrupt doctrine, and is explained for us by Matthew in the words,—"Then understood they how that he bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees." We have attempted in our remarks on the other Parables, to describe the manner in which Christianity began to be heathenized. The process of transformation continued, until the truths of revelation were entirely changed by the gradual admixture of human traditions and philosophies, which, like leaven, were not merely corrupt in themselves, but had also the property of imparting their own nature to that with which they were mingled. The earthly agency by which this strange result was achieved became more and more powerful until in time the whole society of the Roman world was interpenetrated with its influence, and men regarded themselves as Christians when they were really polytheistic idolators who had changed the names of their gods. Three kinds of leaven mentioned by the Lord may be easily distinguished in this apostasy. In both the Greek and the Latin communities there has ever been a sufficiency of Pharisees, those who have, perhaps, some kind of faith in which they teach, but who put their trust in outward forms, in the traditions of men. And again; there is always a plentiful sprinkling of Sadducees, men who decline, more or less, to believe anything which they have not experienced, or cannot understand. Of Herodians, who would support religion by the arm of secular power, and who consider political intrigue a fitting means for advancing the interests of Christ's kingdom, it is needless to speak. Men of this class have ever been conspicuous in communities of apostate Churches, and in none more than that of Rome. But there are also many misguided believers, of more orthodox views, who so mind earthly things that they are often found to be practically regarding the political questions of the day as more important than the far weightier matters of the heavenly Kingdom. Such, then, was the period of the leaven; nor have reformations or revivals, however great their partial success, been able to free Christendom from its pernicious influence.

RUNNING THE GAUNTLET.

OR
THE SHIELD OF A CHRISTIAN MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Hazing.

THE committee having Fitzroy's matter in charge had held several stormy sessions before arriving at any decision. The fact that Seymour and young Hellings refused to act with them, made the older boys very cautious, and the result was that many modifications and changes were made before any plan could be perfected.

George Browne urged that, as Fitzroy was a "city chap," used to delicacies, hot baths, and warm rooms, he could not stand treatment which a robust country youth would consider but child's play. Besides this, rumors were afloat that Fitzroy carried a pistol. Hence, they finally agreed upon the following method of hazing the scapegoat, who had made so many enemies in the neighborhood of Brookdale Academy:

Blake's room was fitted up like a mock court of justice. A barrel, draped with green muslin, was the judge's seat, with chairs for the lawyers, jurors, and witnesses. Browne was to act as the judge, and he was dressed in a black gown, such as clergymen wear, and which had probably been "borrowed" from a neighboring parsonage. His head was to be covered with a mask, representing a huge owl's head, and the effect was strikingly ludicrous.

Around and over the judge's seat were to be upright sticks, bearings little tin cups filled with a sponge and alcohol. The four posts of the bedstead were to be topped out in the same way, and half a dozen of the boys were to have flambeaux, a sort of home-made torch, with a sponge of alcohol on the end.

When these were all lighted for the final trial, and the boys put on their grotesque regalia, the scene defied description. Every one was ready to explode with laughter as they looked at each other, and yet, by Browne's command, not one would dare to laugh. He knew perfectly, and they all realized, that one giggle would start the whole crowd, like a spark of fire to a train of powder.

The plan was to go thus to Fitzroy's room, knock, and whether finding him in bed or otherwise, to get him to open the door; then seize him, and put a gag down his throat, to prevent his crying out; then bind his hands behind him, and secure his ankles, carry him over to Blake's room, and put him in the prisoners' dock, facing the court and jury. Such a demonstration would frighten any ordinary mortal; but it was rendered perfectly hideous by the blue flames of the alcohol, which threw a ghastly pallor over the scene.

The prisoner would then be accused of various crimes, including the violation of the Ten Commandments. Upon being proved "guilty" by the witnesses testifying against him, the jury would convict him, and he would be finally sentenced to three hours' residence in the purgatorial fire to burn away his past offences, destroy the evil in his nature and teach him manners.

Milton Seymour knew scarcely anything of these arrangements. He had satisfied his conscience by protesting at the meeting and had convinced himself that it was no part of his duty to prevent the students from hazing the scapegoat. Schoolboy honor forbade him notifying the authorities of the Academy of what he knew of the situation of the boys. But he was not alone in this. He had heard that the hazing was to be on Monday, and the hazing was to take place, he was so distraught that his mother remarked it. She was worried, but he was reluctant to speak of it. At last, after some pressure, he said:

"Well, mother, I expect there will be high times down at school to-night."

"Indeed," said Mrs. Seymour, looking at him with interest, "pray what will happen?"

"Oh! nothing much; only the boys will give that new sprout of city aristocracy an initiation which will eclipse anything ever known in Brookdale. He is the dandy who intimated that your cheeks were painted! They will paint him to-night, no doubt, and give him all he deserves."

Mrs. Seymour seemed to be thoughtful and serious, and at this point turned her face full upon her son, as if to read his thoughts, and said:

"Milton, you are an acknowledged leader in that school. May I trust your discretion, not to involve yourself in any boyish difficulties? What part have you taken in this matter? You seem to know all about it."

"Pardon me, me, mother dear; I know nothing whatever of the details. Hellings and I moved to refer Fitzroy's conduct to Professor Smart, and you remember my promise to you. I am trying to be more manly."

This was said with sincerity, and with rather a wounded air, but it did not satisfy his mother.

"I feel thankful, Milton, that you can say so; and now can you assure me that you have not encouraged these proceedings?"

"Yes, I can say I have not," replied Milton.

"But have you discouraged them?"

"Well, not exactly that; no, I can't say—"

From her look and manner Milton feared that his mother was displeased. She asked to be excused for a few moments, and went into the library, and wrote as follows:

ROSE COTTAGE, Monday Evening.

DEAR PROFESSOR SMART:—

My son Milton, who is spending the evening here with some friends, tells me that a demonstration is to be made to-night against Pemberton Fitzroy. Fearing that something serious may result from it, I deem it proper to advise you, at the risk of being considered officious.

Asking your pardon, if I cause you any unnecessary alarm, I remain,

Very sincerely yours,

MAUD C. H. SEYMOUR.

A wise little woman was Mrs. Seymour. She knew now that her son was not directly implicated in the affair, and she wanted to shield him entirely, even from the suspicion of having encouraged it. But suppose Milton had seen that letter; it might have spoiled the evening's fun, and have belittled him before his fellow students as a tell-tale. The letter went, however, and Milton was in blissful ignorance of the fact.

As may be imagined, her note caused a sensation in the Academy. After reading it Professor Smart sent for three of the teachers. After a conference, it was agreed that they should proceed at once to the scene of war, bivouac on the outskirts, and, like cavalry, only enter the fray, if needed.

The committee to haze Fitzroy met by appointment, at eight o'clock to complete arrangements. It was finally agreed that their rendezvous should be Blake's room, directly opposite to that occupied by Fitzroy. The boys intending to participate were all there at the appointed time; the doors and windows were muffled with blankets, so as to allow neither light nor sound to be seen or heard from without.

Feed Them Properly

It is well known that the perfectly large percentage of children who are born with weak constitutions are the result of improper feeding. The most important matter in the feeding of infants is the quality of the food. The only food that is both pure and easily digested is the milk of the mother. If the mother's milk is not sufficient, the best substitute is the milk of a healthy cow. The milk of a cow should be fresh, and should be kept in a cool place until it is used.

the carpet was taken up, and all the furniture piled upon the bed.

Every evening at ten o'clock one of the teachers came around and tapped at the door of each room, and pupils not responding, were marked as being absent after hours, contrary to the regulations of the Academy. His footsteps and knocks were already heard in the entry, and upon approaching Fitzroy's room, he noticed a strong odor of cigar-smoke, and heard loud talking within. Taking a chair he stood on it and looking through the transome, he saw a sorrowful, sickening sight. Fitzroy, and two young men of the fast and fancy type, were playing at cards, and evidently for money, as there were several piles of it on the table. They were all smoking, and a bottle of liquor and pitcher of water, with plenty of tumblers and lemons, were there also and the liquors did not stagnate for the want of drinkers. They had been drinking and gambling for several hours, and from present appearances would not be through for another, all of which was duly reported to the professor. The teachers were still on the look-out, but not having seen or heard any signs of the hazers, they went for a few moments down to the Professor's room to ask him if he wished the watch continued.

As it happened, their absence was the very moment of action. The boys issued from Blake's room, and George Browne headed the party. They had not the slightest suspicion that Fitzroy had friends with him, nor of the bad character of his associates, but supposed he was alone, and in bed, it now being past eleven o'clock.

The knock at Fitzroy's door was promptly answered in a rough voice, "Who's there?" when the lamp was turned down, and the door opened a few inches; whereupon the boys rushed in and seized Fitzroy, who yelled furiously. Being more than half intoxicated, he was seized with panic. He struggled desperately, while his companions seemed paralyzed with fear.

They soon recovered themselves, however, and went to Fitzroy's assistance. With their aid he broke loose from his assailants and leaped across the room to where a bureau stood. He opened a drawer and drew out something which glittered in the lamp-light. There was a flash and a loud report and then a sharp cry. Patterson Green lay on the floor shot in the side.

Consternation fell on all at the sight.

the hazers fled to their rooms to find the tell-table evidences of participation, but a few remained gazing sorrowfully at the wounded boy. The report of the pistol awakened the whole academy, and the corridor was soon crowded with the boys and girls eagerly inquiring what had happened. Green was picked up and taken to his room, and a surgeon was summoned.

For an anxious time until the doctor came, poor Pat's face was so deathly pale that the teachers who watched him felt that he would die before the doctor came. But the anxiety dispelled when the surgeon arrived and examined the wound. "It is a dangerous wound," he said, "but it is impossible to say how things will turn out. The boy might die or live, it is twenty-four hours before a reliable opinion could be given. He must be kept quiet, and an experienced nurse must watch him."

"When I could see Seymour," said Pat, "I was told that his case was doubtful."

"Do you want to see him, Pat?" asked the teacher who was standing by the door.

"He is different from the others, and he is against this business. I believe he is a Christian, and if I am likely to die, I would sooner see him than a minister." "You won't die," said the teacher. "Seymour will be here in the morning, and then you can see him."

"I may die to-night, and then it will be too late," said the poor lad. "I wish you would see Seymour."

He was restless and feverish during the night, and again asked for Seymour. "He had been lying down in the morning, and when he came to look at him, he was shocked by his changed appearance."

"He is too much fever here," he said. "This is the thing I feared. His recovery very doubtful. You must send for the boy he wants to see to calm him."

A messenger was accordingly dispatched to Seymour's house to summon him.

A few minutes after receiving the summons, Seymour was dressed and ready for his errand to his friend. On going to the room, he was surprised to find his waiting and ready to accompany him with her usual thoughtfulness. "I am sorry to hear that a suffering, perishing boy, without a mother or sister, might need a woman's attention."

In silence they approached the door. Upon entering the ante-room, they saw several of the teachers and the boy from whom they learned the particulars of the affair. As Mrs. Seymour entered the room, and those of her son, the wounded lad, they at once entered his chamber.

The wounded boy tossing restlessly on the bed, saw them the moment they entered.

"My old man," he said, "I am glad to see you. It is kind of you to come, and your forebodings have come true."

He grasped his hot hand in silent prayer.

"Is that you have with you? Cartridges?"

"No," said Milton, "that is my mother. She might like a lady to make a dress for you, as you have no sister or mother here. She will stay with you if you like."

"She is very kind of her; I hope she will. I am grateful. I am very ill, and I say I may die. That is why I want to see you. From things you have said, I am a Christian. I want you to tell me I have never had any religious faith, but if I am going to die I ought to know something about it. Tell me, what I ought to do."

"When you would let my mother tell me," said Milton. "It is she who taught me now."

He looked to Mrs. Seymour as she sat by Milton's side and said: "It seems to me I am going to die."

"Yes," she answered, "but it can be so dreadful."

"Jesus can make a dying bed, and feel soft as downy pillows are."

"How?" asked Green.

"He gives such sweet peace to those who trust in him. He makes them feel that they are safe in his hands."

"I wish he would do that for me."

"He will if you believe in him."

"I do not understand."

Mrs. Seymour explained in simple terms how God forgives those who come to him through Christ.

"But the past sins?" suggested Green.

"Are all forgiven, if we now repent and believe."

"What, at the last hour?" said the sufferer.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Seymour, "listen to this:

"The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day,
And there may I, though vile as he,
Wash all my sins away."

"Are you sure of that?" asked Green, looking with intense interest at Mrs. Seymour, who replied:

"The soul that on Jesus has leaned for repose,
He will not, he will not, desert to its foes,
That soul, though all hell should endeavor to shake, He'll never, no never, no never forsake."

"I can't see, but can hear," said the sick boy, faintly, as he stretched out his hand. "Seymour, are you near? Will you and your mother pray with me, and I will try to believe and trust." So saying he closed his eyes, and breathed irregularly.

Mrs. Seymour and her son knelt by the bedside, and in tender earnest words the good widow prayed that God would enlighten the dark mind of the sufferer and lead him to peace and rest in Christ.

Green lay still when they rose, but he took hold of Mrs. Seymour's hand and held it in a firm clasp. Presently he fell into a light sleep, from which he woke with a start. His gaze wandered about the room till it rested on Mrs. Seymour. He beckoned her to his side.

"Do you know any passage of Scripture that would suit me?" he asked. "I think I am going to die. I feel so faint."

They gave him the medicine the doctor had left for him, and then Mrs. Seymour, sitting by the bedside and holding his hand, thought of such verses as seemed appropriate. She spoken in a low sweet voice at intervals.

"Fear thou not for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee."

These were the last words that Green heard, and with a smile of peace as he uttered the words "thanks," he closed his eyes, and slept for an hour.

UNDER THE ROD.

GATHER up the broken play-things,
Lay the little shoes away,
For the darling feet that wore them,
Never more on earth will stray.

Put away the little dresses,
And the hat with its torn brim
For I cannot bear to see them,
They remind me so of him.

He was all I had to live for,
He my light, my life, my all!
Now the world seems dark unto me,
Shadowed with a funeral pall.

Can it be that God still loves us,
When he lays us down so low?
Is his heart now filled with pity,
As he looks upon my woe?

Daughter, in thine hour of anguish,
When thy tie to earth was riven,
Did'st thou in that solemn moment,
Think by whom the gift was given?

And that God with loving kindness,
Had recalled what was his own,
And although his hand lay heavy,
Yet he left thee not alone.

Over thee he bent with pity,
With thy tears his own were shed,
But for thee his tears were falling,
Not for him whom thou call'st dead.

For his little feet have entered
Through the gates of pearly white:
He before the throne is singing!
Robed in garments, pure and bright.

Oh, look up! behold thy Saviour,
See his arms are open wide,
He is ready to receive you,
He'll sustain whatever betide.

He will never, never leave thee,
But will guide thy weary feet,
Till the sands of life cease running,
Till you walk the golden street.

Requests for Prayer.

AT the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Sept. 6, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of Relatives and Friends. O. B. Moscow, Ia., asks prayer for the conversion of a son who does not regard the Lord's day; also that her husband and brother may be led to trust Christ for salvation.—Wretched Mother, Topeka, Kans., that her son who has left his home to associate with godless people, may see the error of his way and may seek pardon of God through Christ.—M. N., Fulshear, Tex., that her husband who is without faith in Christ may realize his need of a Saviour and give his heart to the Lord.—Reader, Strubie, Iowa, that her husband's heart may be changed so that he may love God and lead a Christian life; also that her son who is in bad company might become a child of God and give up his evil ways.

—A Virginia Lady, Lynchburg, for the salvation of a cousin who is a great sinner, and that God would use him in his service.—M. J. M., San Diego, Cal., that a son and daughter who are far from God may seek him through Christ and be made new creatures in him.—Villager, Franklin, N.Y., that her husband who has fallen under the power of drink, may look to Christ for deliverance and may consecrate his life to the Saviour.—J. H., Farnhamville, Ia., that an invalid who is sorely troubled about the salvation of his soul may find peace in Christ.—Anxious Mother, that her son may be delivered from the power of drink and become a true Christian.—Believer, Bodka, Ala., for the conversion of an untruthful woman who has caused deep suffering by circulating false and slanderous reports, that she may see the evil of what she has done and make reparation by declaring the truth.

—J. S., Lawrence, Kans., for the conversion of her husband for which she has been praying for many years.—One who Loves, Erie, Pa., that a dear friend who was brought up in the Catholic faith may, with his wife, find salvation in Christ.—A. M., Ouray, Col., that her husband may give himself to the Lord and be delivered from all his sins.—Believer, Roversford, Pa., for the conversion of a man and his wife and their two sons; also that the writer's husband may learn to know and love Christ.—Believer, Texas, for the conversion of a brother who was tenderly reared but is now alone in the world and in danger of falling through strong drink as he is without faith in Christ.

Thanks for Answered Prayer. H. H., Hamilton, Ont., asks that praise may be given to God for the improvement in the condition of his demented son, for whose recovery prayer was recently offered at the Bowery Mission.—Distressed Father, Boston, Mass., desires gratefully to acknowledge the goodness of God in answering the prayers offered a few weeks ago in respect to his two daughters. The answer has been most complete, and it came in a way that surprised the whole family.

For the Restoration of Health. H. O. W., Louisville, Ky., asks prayer that a certain weakness which is interfering with usefulness in Christ's service may be removed.—O. B., Moscow, Idaho, for the recovery of a daughter and sister-in-law, both of whom have suffered long from painful diseases.—I. C. N., Philadelphia, that a young girl who is very sick may recover her health.—V. M., Columbus, Ky., that her dear grandmother and an uncle, who are afflicted, may be restored.—"Daughter of Affliction," Averett, Va., that God would mercifully restore the sense of hearing.—J. S., Lawrence, Kans., who has been a lifelong sufferer, that God would raise her up and remove the dread she has of a fatal disease.—"Believer," Wheeling, W. Va., that an affliction which has resisted all the measures adopted for its removal may be healed by the Lord.—M. C. D., Colorado City, Colo., for the recovery of a daughter who has been a sufferer for eight years past, but is not beyond the power of the Great Physician.—"Reader," Lynchburg, Va., that a friend who is very sick and who is anxious to recover that she may do her duty at an appointed time, may be raised up by the power of God.—E. R., Colorado City, Colo., that a dear brother who is very sick may be healed.—"Believer," Lynn, Mass., that a child of God who is approaching a very trying ordeal, may be supported and brought safely through, and that it may have the desired effect in the relief of a distressing sickness.—J. L. I., Kankakee, Ill., that a sick mother whose family sorely need her services, may be raised up from a bed of sickness.—M. E. A., Stockton, Cal., for the recovery of her two daughters, who are very sick.

For Special Blessings. E. J. W., Mayesville, S. C., that it may please God to incline the hearts of his people to provide the funds so urgently needed for the erection of a school-house for the colored people of that section, who could do so much if they had an education.—H. M. L., Rochester, N. H., that a young woman who is in urgent need of employment may be enabled to obtain a situation in which she may have an opportunity of study; also that a family may be relieved of a hindrance to their spiritual progress.—Reader, Niagara, Ont., that God will mercifully grant deliverance from the fear of death.—Almost Hopeless, that one who has long been out of employment might be enabled to find work.—Faith, Wilmington, Del., that one who has prayed for a long time and is much discouraged, may have grace to believe and trust in God and may be able to acquiesce in his will.—E. M., Kankakee, Ill., that one who is in great darkness owing to doubt about her conversion, may be led into the right path and may have assurance of being a child of God.—Distressed One, Va., that a calamity apparently impending may in God's mercy be averted.—Reader, Lynchburg, Va., that a son who is striving hard to obtain employment may be guided to some one who will give him work.—Believer, Wheeling, W. Va., that a family at variance with each other may have the spirit of love and cease their quarreling.—Distressed Husband, New York, that his wife may be preserved from the allurements of the theatre, and give up evil companions who are leading her to forsake her Saviour to whom she consecrated her life in her youth.—Subscriber, Jersey City, N. J., that God in his mercy would give him the power to resist the temptation to which he is daily exposed, and in some way remove the tempter in whose company he is powerless.

Persons desiring the prayers of the Converts' Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission should address their letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 91-102 Bible House, New York.

AN ENTHUSIASTIC CLERGYMAN.

Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr., Speaks, and His Opponents Create a Disturbance—Comments of the New York Papers.

On Sunday morning, Sept. 6th, Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr., announced that he would preach on "The Political Crisis," and probably 4,000 people gathered at the Academy of Music—the "People's Church"—to hear this brilliant pulpit orator who is not afraid to think for himself and tell his thoughts to the public. During the sermon he was again and again interrupted, but as the New York Herald of the following day says, "The hisses that broke in on the preacher's vigorous sentences were drowned by cheers and applause." The unusually clear and penetrating voice of Mr. Dixon stood him in good stead in this clamor. In this connection the following letter, written only a week before, seems particularly to the point.

New York, August 26, 1891.

Dear Sir:—I am very loath as a minister to give an endorsement to a patented article, but I feel it but just to you to say that I have used your Hyomei for Bronchitis with perfect success. I had a chronic cold last winter which stubbornly resisted every remedy for seven weeks. Your Hyomei gave me relief in one day and enabled me to fulfil all my subsequent lecture dates with satisfaction. Truly yours,

(Rev.) THOMAS DIXON, JR.,
Pastor People's Church.

Kind-Hearted Princess. Cens a Holiday Home for Poor Chil- dren in London.

England, where there is a great deal suffering among the poor at all seasons of the year, and where there are thousands of children in the same painful and neglected condition as the orphan waifs of New York, royalty has at last begun to take an active interest in Samaritan work among the

For years ago, Princess Christian, a member of the royal family, whose name has been touched by the condition of neglected little ones, hired, furnished and opened a small house in London as a Holiday Home for poor boys. She and her daughters entered enthusiastically into the work, which rapidly expanded under her hands. By-and-by a larger cottage was built, and this in turn was displaced by a beautiful new home, just opened by the Princess, assisted by a very prominent philanthropic company.

The new Holiday Home is situated on the edge of Windsor Park and almost in the shadow of the stately castle, in which England's Queen resides. An idea of its appearance may be formed from the illustration on this page. Several acres of ground surround it. On the occasion of a recent visit, Princess Christian did the honors, conducting her daughters to the place and telling them the story of its beginning and progress. It is pleasant to know that one in such a position is a co-worker among the poor. Our own Children's Home at Weymouth, with its seventy acres and hundreds of little tenement guests, is a source of pleasure and blessing to all who visit there, or who by prayer or action send the little sufferers there new summer weeks. These kind of places, like Princess Christian's, are a pleasure in life in bringing health, cheer and joy and love to the heart of the poor.

Europe and the Sultan.

During the past week the rumor of concerted action by the European powers with regard to Turkey has been revived. It is stated that England has at last decided that the day of re-nunciation has passed, and that the Porte is no longer to be allowed to carry out its policy of hate and extermination in Armenia. Emperor William and the Czar have said to have reached an understanding on the same subject which may result in a speedy change in the attitude of the respective governments on this subject. One step in the new policy is the placing of Sultan Hamid under the charge of the Ambassadors and confining his official appointments in Anatolia and elsewhere, thus gradually restoring peace to the Turkish Empire without dismemberment. Hopes based on concerted action by the Powers, however, have hitherto proved so disappointing that these rumors afford slight encouragement to those who are most deeply interested in the protection and welfare of the remnant of the Armenian nation. Many Armenians are leaving Turkey.

How did it happen that the old-fashioned, laborious way of washing was ever given to woman as her particular work? It's an imposition on her. She ought to have had only the easiest things to do—and men, strong, healthy men, ought to have taken up this washing business. Now, here is a suggestion. In those families that still stick to soap and make their washing needlessly hard and unpleasant, let the men do that work. They're better fitted for it. In the families that use Pearline (use soap-out with) and make washing easy, let the women do it. They won't mind it.

The Brilliant Story of Our Country and People.

By JOHN CLARK RIDPATH, the American Historian.

People's History Of the United States

A Book for the Millions!

It is a narrative of whatever is best and most inspiring in the annals of our country. The author has selected the most striking and important parts of the story, and has recited those parts with fervor and enthusiasm. All that is dull and commonplace in our past has been eliminated from the glowing narrative in the People's History. The vital essence is retained. The useless has given place to the useful, the dull to the romantic.

WORKMEN OF JERUSALEM.

The Various Handicrafts of the Holy City in Ancient Times and To-day — Skilled Syrian Stone-Cutters — The "Royal Quarries" Where the Stones Were Dug for the Building of the Temple.

OUR illustration recalls to memory the period of Jerusalem's greatest industrial prosperity, when her skilled workmen in all branches of mechanical labor, were famous throughout Syria, and when the public, as well as many private buildings of the Holy City itself, were regarded as models of beauty and stability. From the time of the Temple until the Roman invasion, Jerusalem existed in ancient city, as a whole, lies buried under many layers of debris.

Solomon was undoubtedly the first of the Jewish Kings to invest labor with its highest dignity. When he began to plan the construction of the great Temple, he cast about to secure the services of the ablest workmen not only in his own dominions, but in the lands adjoining. Timber was brought from the cedar forests

There the stones for the Temple were hewn and dressed and prepared, each one ready to set in place, for it was decreed that in the building itself neither sound of axe nor hammer nor any tool should be heard. It is generally admitted that the large stones in the west wall of the Temple area, and in several other places, belong to the age of Solomon, even though the wall itself may have been reconstructed. Some of those massive blocks, isted in strong and graceful architecture, and in David's time, as the Psalmist declared, it was compactly built. (Ps. 122: 3.) Zion's sons and daughters gloried in the strength of her towers and the beauty of her palaces, and her massive walls, the bulwarks of the Holy City. In those days strength in architectural design was not sacrificed to beauty; yet the early Jewish master-builders were men of much talent and adepts in their art, as is testified by the ruins of buildings believed to have been erected in David's time, and still standing, although the of Lebanon for the carpenters. Great massive boulders of white limestone were hewn out of the royal quarries, that extended like a network beneath the city, and the entrance to which was only rediscovered by the Palestine Exploration Society in 1852, near the Damascus Gate, after having been a mystery for centuries. In these vast subterranean quarries, chisel marks and mason's marks were found on the stones that strewed the floor; niches were seen in the rocks where lamps had been placed to give light to the workers.

dug from the underground quarries by Jewish masons, have been actually kissed smooth by devout Hebrews, to whom the very dust of the city is precious. Probably no building on the globe has had larger corner-stones employed in its construction than the Temple of Solomon. The masons fitted into the southwest angle of the wall one huge block fourteen feet in length and three feet, eight inches in thickness; another at the southeast angle was twenty-six feet long, six feet high and seven feet

Gates of Carbuncle.

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., } "And I will make thy windows of agates, on the Text: Isaiah 54: 12. . . . } and thy gates of carbuncles."

PERHAPS because a human disease of most painful and oftentimes fatal character is named after it, the church and the world have never done justice to that intense and all-suggestive precious stone, the carbuncle. The pearl that Christ picked up to illustrate his sermon, and the jasper and the sapphire and the amethyst which the apocalyptic vision masoned into the wall of heaven have had proper recognition, but this, in all the ages, is the first sermon on the carbuncle.

This precious stone is found in the East Indies, in color is an intense scarlet, and held up between your eye and the sun it is a burning coal. The poet puts it into rhythm as he writes :

For another interesting and well-researched book, see Arcturion by Anne and the late George A. Arcturion, known to me.

God sets it high up in Bible crystallography. He cuts it with a divine chisel, shapes it with a precise geometry, and kindles its fire into an almost supernatural flame of beauty. Its law of symmetry, its law of zones, its law of parallelism, something to excite the amazement of the scientist, chime the cantos of the poet, and arouse the adoration of the Christian. No one but the infinite God could fashion a carbuncle as large as your thumb-nail, and as if to make all ages appreciate this precious stone he ordered it set in the first row of the high priest's breast-plate in olden time and higher up than the onyx and the emerald and the diamond, and in Ezekiel's prophecies concerning the splendors of the Tyrian court, the carbuncle is mentioned, the brilliancies of the walls and of the tessellated floors suggested by the Bible sentence, "Thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire!" But in my text it is not a solitary specimen that I hand you, as the keeper of a museum might take down from the shelf a precious stone and allow you to examine it. Nor is it the panel of a door that you might stand and study for its unique carvings or bronzed traceries, but there is a whole gate of it lifted before our admiring and astounded vision, aye! two gates of it, aye! many gates of it: "I will make thy gates of carbuncles." What gates? Gates of the Church. Gates of anything worth possessing. Gates of successful enterprise. Gates of salvation. Gates of national achievement. Isaiah, who wrote this text, wrote also all that about Christ "as the lamb to the slaughter," and spoke of Christ as saying, "I have trod the winepress alone," and wrote, "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?" And do you think that Isaiah in my text merely happened to represent the gates as red gates, as carmine gates, as gates of carbuncle? No. He means that it is through atonement, through blood-red struggle, through agonies we get into anything worth getting into. Heaven's gates may well be made of pearl, a it a crimson impress, and all those gates are deeply dyed, and Isaiah was right when he spoke of those gates as gates of carbuncle.

What an odd thing it is, think some, this idea of vicarious suffering or suffering for others! Not at all. The world has seen vicarious suffering millions of times before Christ came and demonstrated it on a scale that eclipsed all that went before and all that shall come after. Rachel lived only long enough after the birth of her son to give him a name. In faint whisper she said, "Call him Ben-oni," which means "son of my pain," and all modern travelers on the road from Jerusalem to Bethel uncover their heads and stand reverently at the tomb of Rachel who died for her boy. But in all ages how many mothers die for their children, and in many cases grown-up children, who by recreancy stab clear through the mother's heart! Suffering for others? Why, the world is full of it. "Jump!" said the engineer to the fireman on the locomotive. "One of us is enough to die. Jump!" And so the engineer died at his post, trying to save the train. When this summer the two trains crashed into each other near Atlantic City, among the forty-seven who lost their lives, the engineer was found dead with one hand on the throttle of the locomotive and the other on the brake. Aye! there are hundreds here to-day suffering for others. You know and God knows that it is vicarious sacrifice. But on one limestone hill about twice the height of this church, five minutes' walk from the gates of Jerusalem, was the sublimest case of suffering for others that the world ever saw or ever will see. Christ the victim, human and satanic malevolence the executioner, the whole human race having an overwhelming interest in the spectacle. To open a way for us sinful men and sinful women into glorious pardon and high hope and eternal exultation, Christ, with hand dripping with the rush of opened arteries, swung back the gate, ad behold! it is a red gate, a gate of deepest hue, a gate of carbuncle.

What is true in spirituals is true in temporals. There are young men and older men who hope, through the right settlement of this acrid controversy between silver and gold, or the bimetallic quarrel, that it will become easy to make a living. That time will never come. It never has been easy to make a living. The men who have it very easy now, went through hardships and self-denials to which most young men would never consent. Unless they got it by inheritance, you cannot mention twenty men who have come to honorable fortune that did not fight their way inch by inch, and against fearful odds that again and again almost destroyed them. For some good reason God has arranged it for all the centuries that the only way for most people to get a livelihood for themselves and their families is with both hands and all the allied forces of body, mind, and soul to push back and push open the red gate, the gate of carbuncle. For the benefit of all young men, if I had the time, I would tell the tale of those who came one oblique, How many of the thirty men who went one way on Pennsylvania Avenue and reached the United States Senate, or who followed the other way on Pennsylvania Avenue and reached the White House, did not have to climb over political obloquy? Not one. How much scorn and scoff, and brutal attack did

Horace Mann endure between the time when he first began to fight for a better common school system in Massachusetts, and the day when a statue in honor of him was placed on the steps of the State House overlooking "The Commons?"

Read the biography of Robert Hall, the Baptist preacher, who, though he had been pronounced a dunce at school, lived to thrill the world with his Christian eloquence; and of George Peabody, who never owned a carriage, and denied himself all luxuries, that he might while living and after death, through last will and testament, devote his uncounted millions to the education of the poor people in England and America; and of Bishop Janes, who in boyhood worked his passage from Ireland to America, and became the joy of Methodism and a blessing to the race. Go to the biographical alcove in city, State, or national library, and find at least every other book an illustration of overcome obstacle, and of carmine gate that had to be forced open.

What is true of individuals is true of nations. Was it a mild spring morning when the Pilgrim Fathers landed on Plymouth Rock, and did they come in a gilded yacht, gay streamers flying? No. It was in cold December, and from a ship in which one would not want to cross the Hudson or the Potomac river. Scalping-knives all ready to receive them, they landed, their only welcome the Indian war-whoop. Red men on the beach. Red men in the forest. Red men on the mountains. Red men in the valleys. Living gates of red men. Gates of carbuncle!

Aboriginal hostility pushed back, surely now our forefathers will have nothing to do but to take easy possession of the fairest continent under the sun. The skies so genial, the soil so fertile, the rivers so populous with finny life, the acreage so immense, there will be nothing to do but eat, drink, and be merry. No. The most powerful nation, by army and navy, sounded its protest across three thousand miles of water. Then came Lexington, and Bunker Hill, and Monmouth, and Long Island battles, and Valley Forge, and Yorktown, and starvation, and widowhood, and orphanage, and the thirteen colonies went through sufferings which the historian has attempted to put upon paper, and the artist to put upon canvas, but all in vain. Engraver's knife, and reporter's skill, and telegraphic wire, and daily press, which have made us acquainted with the horrors of modern battle-field, had not yet begun their vigilance, and the story of the American Revolution has never been told, and never will be told. It did not take much ink to sign the Declaration of Independence, but it took a terrific amount of blood to maintain it. It was an awful gate of opposition that the men and women—and the women as much as the men—pushed back. It was a gate of self-sacrifice. It was a gate of blood. It was a gate of carbuncle.

We are not indebted to history for our knowledge of the greatest of national crises. Many of us remember it, and fathers and mothers now living had better keep telling that story to their children, so that instead of their being dependent upon cold type and obliged to say, "On such a page of such a book you can read that," will they rather be able to say, "My father told me so!" "My mother told me so!" Men and women who vividly remember 1861, and 1862, and 1863, and 1864, be yourselves the historians, telling it, not with pen, but with living tongue and voice and gesture. That is the great use of Memorial Decoration Day, for the calla lilies on the grave-tops soon become breathless of perfume, and in a week turn to dust like unto that which lies beneath them. But the story of courage and self-sacrifice and patriotism told on platforms and in households and by the roadside and in churches and in cemeteries, by that annual recital will be kept fresh in the memory of generations as long as our American institutions are worthy of preservation. Long after we are dead your children will be able to read with the Psalmist, "We have heard by our ears, O God, our fathers have told us what work thou didst in their days, in the times of old." But what a time it will be! Four years of homesickness! Four years of brotherly and sisterly estrangement! Four years of martyrdom! Four years of massacre! Put them in a long line, a conflagration of cities, and see them roll up a whole continent! Put them in the rows, the hospitals, making a vast metropolis of pain and paroxysm! Gather them in one vast assemblage, the million bereft from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific beaches! Put the tears into lakes, and the blood into rivers, and the shrieks into whirlwinds! During those four years many good and wise men at the North and the South saw nothing ahead but nihilism. With such a national debt could never meet our obligations! With such mortal antipathies Northern and Southern men could never come to amity! Representatives of Louisiana, Georgia, and the Carolinas could not again sit side by side with the Representatives of Maine, Massachusetts, and New York at the national capital. Lord John Russell had declared that we were "a bubble-bursting nationality," and it came true. The nations of Europe had gathered with very resigned sympathy at the funeral of our American public. They had tolled the bells on the Parliaments and Reichstags and lowered their flags at half-mast, and even the lion on the other side of the sea had whined for a dead eagle on this side. The deep graves had been dug, and beside Babylon, Thebes, and Tyre, and other dead nations of the past our dead Republic was to be buried. The epitaph was all ready: "Here lies the American Republic. Buried at Philadelphia, 4th of July, 1776. Killed at Bull Run July 21, 1861. Aged eighty-five years and seventeen days. Peace to its ashes." But before the obsequies quite closed there was an interruption to the ceremonies, and our dead nation rose from its mortuary surroundings. God had made for it a special Resurrection Day, and cried, "Come forth, thou Republic of Washington, and John Adams, and Thomas Jefferson, and Patrick Henry, and John Hancock, and Daniel Webster, and S. S. Prentiss, and Henry Clay. Come forth!" And she came forth, stronger than she had ever been. Her mightiest prosperities have come since that time. Who would want to push her out of this country to what it was in 1860 or 1865? But, oh! what a high gate, what a strong gate she had to push back before she could make one step in advance! Gate of flame! See Norfolk Navy Yard, and Columbia, and Chambersburg, and Charleston on fire! Gate of bayonets! Glittering rifles and carbines flash from Susquehanna, and the James, to the Mississippi, and the Arkansas! Gate of heavy artillery, making the mountains of Tennessee and Kentucky and Virginia tremble as though the earth itself were struggling in its last agony. The gate was so fiery and so red that I can think of nothing more appropriate than to take the suggestion of Isaiah in the text and call it a gate of carbuncles.

This country has been for the most part of its history passing through crises, after each crisis was better off than before it entered it, and now we are at another crisis. We are told on one hand that gold is kept as a standard and silver is elevated, confidence will be restored and this nation will rise triumphant from the financial misfortunes that have been afflicting us. On the other hand, we are told that if the free coinage of silver is allowed, all the wheels of business will revolve, the poor man will have a better chance, and all our industries will begin to hum and roar. During the last presidential elections I have been urged to enter the political arena, but I never ha-and ever will turn the pulpit in which I preach into a political stump. Every minister must do as he feels called to do, and will not criticise him for doing what he considers his duty; but all the political harangues from pulpits from now until the 1 of November will not in all the United States change one vote, but will leave many ears stopped against anything that such clergymen may utter the rest of their lives. As a general rule the laymen of churches understand politics better than the clergy, because they (the laymen) study politics more than the clergy, and have better opportunity of being intelligent on those subjects. But good morals, honesty, loyalty, Christian patriotism, and the Ten Commandments, these we must preach. God says distinctly in the Bible, "The silver and the gold are mine," and he will settle the controversy between those two metals. If ever this country needed the Divine rescue it needs it now. Never within my memory have so many people literally starved to death in the past few months. Have you noticed in the newspapers how many men and women here and there have been found dead, the post-mortem examination stating that the cause of death was hunger. There is not a day that we do not see the crash of some great commercial establishment, and as a consequence many are thrown out of employment. Among what we considered comfortable ones have come privation and close calculation and an economy that kills. Millions of people who say nothing about it at this moment at their wits' end. There are millions of people who do not want charity but want work. The cry goes up to the ears of the "Lord of alms," and the prayer will be heard and relief will come. If we have nothing left to depend on than American politics, relief will never come. Whoever is elected to the Presidency, the wheels of Government turn so slowly, and a caucus in our white building on the hill may tie the hands of any President. Now, though we who live in the District of Columbia cannot vote, we can pray, and my prayer every night shall be, "O, God, hear the cry of the souls from under the altar! Thou hast brought the wheat and corn of this season to such magnitude of supply, give food to man and beast. Thou who knowest not where to lay thy head, pity the homeless. Thou who has brought to ruin the cotton of the South and the wheat of the North, clothe the naked. Thou who hast filled the mine with coal, give bread to the shivering. Bring bread to the ignorant to enlighten the mind, and salvation to the soul of all the people! God be the nation!"

But we must admit it is a hard gate to push back. Millions of thin hands are pushed at it without making it swing on its hard hinges. It is a gate made out of rusty flour barrels, and cold fire grates, and ornate apparel, and cheerless homes, and unmedicated sickness, and ghastly and horror. It is a gate of struggle, a gate of penury. A red gate, or what Isaiah would have called a gate of articles.

Now, as I have already suggested, as we are obstacles in all our paths, we will be happier if we consent to have our life a struggle. I do not know any one to whom it is not a struggle. In all styles of life there is disappointment and struggle. God has for some good reason arranged it so. If it is not poverty, it is sickness. If it is not sickness, it is persecution. If it is not persecution, it is contest with some evil appetite. If it is not some evil appetite, it is bereavement. If it is not one thing, it is another. Do not get soured and cross and think your case is peculiar. You are just like the rest of us. You will have to take the bitter draught whether it be handed to you in a golden chalice or pewter mug. A man who has a thousand dollars a year income sleeps sounder and has a better appetite than the man who has five millions. If life were not a struggle we would never consent to get out of this world, and we would want to stay here, and so block up the way of the advancing generations. By the time that a man gets to be seventy years of age, and sometimes by the time he gets to be fifty years of age, he says: "I have had enough of this, and when the Lord wills it I am ready to emigrate to a country where there are no taxes and the silver of the trumpet put to one's lips has no quarrel with the gold of the pavement under his feet." We have in this world more opportunity to cultivate patience than to cultivate any other grace. Let that grace be strengthened in the Royal Gymnasium of obstacle and opposition, and by the help of God, having overcome our own hindrances and worriments, let us go forth to help others whose struggle is greater than our own.

A friend told me the other day of a shoemaker in a Russian city whose bench was more Christian, until one day he said to himself: "I wish among all those feet passing up there on the sidewalk I could see the feet of the dear Christ passing. Oh! if I could only see his feet go by, I would know them, because they are scarred feet." That night the shoemaker dreamed, and in the dream he saw the glorious Christ, and he said: "O Christ! I have been waiting for thee to pass on the sidewalk, and I have seen lame feet, and wounded feet, and aged feet, and poor feet, but in vain have I looked for thy scarred feet." And Christ said to the shoemaker, "Man! I did pass on the sidewalk, and you did see my feet, and you did come out and hail me, and bless me, and help me. You thought it was the foot of a poor old man that went shuffling by; that was my foot. You thought it was the foot of a soldier that went limping past; that was my foot. You thought that shoe-will not be so much of a heaven to those who had everything in this world. A man who had everything in this world enters heaven, and the welcoming angel appoints such a newly-arrived soul to a mansion, and says, "Go in and live there. That mansion is yours forever." That man thinks to himself, "Why, I have for many years lived in a mansion; a mansion is no novelty to me." The welcoming angel appoints some prospered soul of earth to a fine landscape in the heavenly country and says, "Walk there and enjoy yourself." The soul thinks to itself, "The place I owned on the Hudson," or, "The castle I had on the Rhine was almost as picturesque, and then I cannot see the sunset on the river, for it is here everlasting day. Let the welcoming angel then say to a prospered soul of earth, 'Go now and rest; this is the everlasting rest.'" "Why," the soul would think, "I am not tired; why do I want to rest? I have not done a stroke of work for the last twenty years. I spent my winters in Florida and my summers in the Adirondacks. and I am not in need of rest." My hearers, heaven will not be so much of a heaven for those who had no struggle on earth. But when those who had a hard push with the red gate of my text, the gate of carbuncle, come to the gate of pearl and find it wide open, they will say, "Why, how strange this is. This is the first gate of valuable entrance in forty years that I have found open." And the welcoming angel will say to some Christian mother who reared a large family of children and prepared them for usefulness and heaven, "Go where you please and sit down on what velvet bank or cushioned throne you may prefer." And I hear the newly-arrived soul saying, "Oh, my! What a good thing it is to rest. I was so tired. I was tired for forty years. Angel, tell me, is this an unbroken rest? Can it be that there are no sick children to take care of? My head was so tired, planning for the household on small means, my eyes were so tired with sewing and knitting, my back ached with doing work that made me stoop for so many hours. There was nothing in the universe I so much needed as rest. Now I have it. Blessed Jesus! Blessed heaven! Blessed rest!" Then the welcoming angel will say to some Christian that on earth was deaf and had not heard voice of song or voice of friendship, "Hark now to the choirs in white as they are about to join in the opening piece of the Temple Worship," and as the baton swings and as the deft fingers begin to feel the pulses of the harp, and lips of martyrs breathe on the soft lutes of praise, I hear the surprised soul, just entered heaven, saying, "Music! Why, that is the first I ever heard. Will it keep on? Tell them not to stop. What is the name of that anthem? Why, I never heard anything like that. I never heard anything at all." Then the angel will say to a lifelong invalid, "Did you ever breathe air like this? Such balm! Such tonic! Did you ever have any climate on earth like this climate of heaven?" And the soul says, "This is the first time in many a long year I have been freed from pain. As I passed through the river by that gate the last ache left me, and I am well, gloriously well, everlastingly well. I have swallowed the last bitter draught. I have felt the last cut of the knife. I have passed the last sleepless night, and now I realize the beauty of what St. John said in Revelation, 'There shall be no more pain.' And then the martyrs and the prophets and the Apostles will take up the chorus, and all the recovered invalids from earth will join in the triumphant refrain that surges to and fro, from east gate of heaven to west gate. Chorus: 'No more pain, no more pain; no more pain, no more pain!'"

My hearers, it will be a great heaven for all who get through, but the best heaven for those who had on earth nothing but struggle. Blessed all those who, before they entered the gate of pearl, passed through the gate of carbuncle!

in the basement of a building, and so far underground that he could see only the feet of those who went by on the sidewalk. Seated on his bench, he often looked up, and there went the swift and skipping feet of children, and then the slow and uniform step of the aged, and then feet with shoes old and worn out, and then crippled feet, and he resolved he would do a kindness to each one who needed it. So when the foot with the old and worn-out shoe was passing, he would hail it and make for it a comfortable covering, for he had the hammer, and the pegs, and the shoe-lasts, and the lapstone, and the leather to do it. And when he saw the invalid foot pass he would hail it and go out and offer medicine and crutch and helpfulness. And when he saw the aged foot pass he hailed it and told the old man of heaven, where he would be young again. When he saw the foot of childhood pass on the sidewalk he would go out with good advice and a laugh that seemed like an echo of the child's. Of course, as the years went on, under this process the shoemaker became more and less foot was the foot of a beggar; that was my foot. The shoes, the clothing, the medicines, the cheering words that you gave to them, you gave to your Lord. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me." My hearers, with the humble spirit of that Russian mechanic, let us go forth and help others. Having shoved back the carbuncle gate for yourself, to pass in, and pass on and pass up, lend a hand to others, that they also may get through the red gate, and pass in, and pass on, and pass up!

But mark well and underscore with heavy dashes of the pen the order of the gates. Gate of carbuncle before gate of pearl. Isaiah the Prince saw the one gate centuries before St. John the Exile saw the other. The one you must push open. The other stands open. Gate of a Saviour's atonement before the gate of Divine pardon. Gate of poverty before gate of affluence. Gate of earthly trial before gate of heavenly satisfaction. Through much tribulation you enter the kingdom of God if you ever enter it at all. But heaven

Solomon's Wise Choice.

Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 11. I Kings 3: 5-15. Golden Text, Psalm 111: 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SOLOMON was a young man when he came to the throne of Israel, but he was a young man chosen of God, and for whom much believing prayer had been offered by his father. David had learned many and bitter lessons through his family. It was an exceptional thing in his experience that prayer should remain unanswered; yet, with regard to his sons, it was so more than once. He besought the Lord for the life of the child which Bathsheba bore to him, he "fasted and went in, and lay all night upon the earth" (II. Sam. 12: 16), but this prayer was not heard, nor yet were his prayers for Absalom. God could not be one with David in a natural affection which usurped his own claims. How often parents who live in an atmosphere of prayer have been astonished when almost the only exception to their unanswered prayers has been those which lay nearest to their hearts, their

for their own children! How many a parent has yet to learn the difference between soulish, emotional, self-proceeding love for their children—a love which seeks its own—and divine love which enters into God's infinitely loving purpose for them. God always hears the prayer of faith for our children. David's love for Solomon was quite different from his love for Absalom. He loved Solomon as being God's choice, as being loved of God; "the Lord loved him" (II. Sam. 12: 2), and "Solomon loved the Lord" (I. Kings 3: 3). David loved Absalom with a father's pride in his beauty and natural attractions, but Absalom loved neither the Lord nor his father, but only himself. When David gave commands to Solomon, he did not expect the fulfilment of them from his son without asking from his God for Solomon what he required of him. "Thou, Solomon my son," he said "know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart and with a willing mind;" "O Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel," he prayed, "give unto Solomon my son a perfect heart to keep thy commandments, thy testimonies, and thy statutes." (I. Chron. 28: 9; 28: 19.)

After the death of David, Solomon married Pharaoh's daughter, but the first notable act of his reign was an appeal to "all Israel, to the captains of thousands and of hundreds, and to the judges and to every governor in all Israel, the chief of the fathers," to meet him in an act of national worship at Gibeon, where the tabernacle was then pitched. It was a recognition of God which every person in his dominion must know of. The young king would let it be known on whose side he was, and that he expected every office which was held under him to be held in the fear of God. It was an acknowledgment of his loyalty and his obedience to, and his dependence on God. The king offered "a thousand burnt offerings" on God Responded.

"In that night did God appear unto Solomon, and said unto him, Ask what I shall give thee" (II. Chron. 1: 7). Oh, how many a child of God has read these words with a wistful, yearning heart, and thought, "Would that God spoke thus to me!" Oh, how blind can God's children be! Our Lord has taken such pains to make us see the grace of God towards us, and yet how few of us know the heart of our God. After teaching his disciples the Lord's Prayer, he spake a parable to shew how great the contrast is between the heart of a mere friend and that of a father. A friend indignantly refuses his friend who disturbs him at midnight. And the only way to obtain from such an one is to continue troubling him until he finds it the best policy to yield, that he may at length get rid of the importunate disturber of his rest. But a father: will he deal thus? If his son asks bread, will he give him a stone? If he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent, or a scorpion, instead of an egg. Has he any claim to be a father who mocks his child when he is hungry and asks bread? And in connection with this strong argument, our Lord says:

"Ask,

adoration, worship, and devotion: "Thou hast shewed unto thy servant, David, my father, great mercy, according as he walked before thee in truth, and in righteousness, and in uprightness of heart with thee; and thou hast kept for him this great kindness that thou hast given him, a son to sit on his throne as it is this day." No boasting of his father's greatness, he saw only God's mercy towards him; no self-conscious assumption, as is so commonly the case with young men, he saw only God's kindness to his father in his own succession to the throne. "And now, O Lord, my God—my God as well as my father's God—thou hast made thy servant king instead of David, my father, and I am but a little child; I know not how to go out or to come in." These are God-taught words in the lips of a young man, and how full of grace they are! They show that Solomon knew his need and that God could supply it.

GIBEON was a high hill about seven miles from Jerusalem. It was an important place in Solomon's time, because the Tabernacle which had accompanied the Israelites in their wanderings through the des-and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you. For every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." The very same God who appeared to Solomon in a dream that night at Gibeon, says to you, "Ask and it shall be given unto you," but ask as one who knows and counts upon a Father who will not, who cannot, refuse his children's bread. He appeals in the strongest way. "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit (the true children's bread, or "good gifts," Matt. 7: 11) to them that ask him" (Luke 16: 5-11). What was Solomon's Reply?

The Almighty God, infinite in resources, had placed at the disposal of the young man, and unconditionally, unlimited possibilities. But God knew his man; young as Solomon was, he had shown in this gathering together of his people to worship that he was not ashamed to declare himself all for God, and God was not afraid to shew himself all for Solomon. The king's answer was one of the deepest ert of Sinai had long been set up there. Until the Temple should be built it was the visible symbol of God's presence in the land and the centre for national worship. Venerable associations clung about it and though the ark had been removed from among its curtains, neither king nor people could forget what it had been to their forefathers. To Gibeon, therefore, Solomon went in solemn state at an early period of his reign, to make reverent acknowledgment to Jehovah on behalf of himself and his people. He made his offering on a scale proportioned to his magnificence. A thousand beasts were slain and offered on the altar as a sacrifice. The number might seem incredible were it not that secular history records similar and even greater numbers offered by other Oriental potentates. Herodotus says that Xerxes made an offering of a thousand oxen to the Trojan Minerva, and Ceresus made an offering of three thousand beasts at Delphi. As a large number of people would undoubtedly be present, the parts of the animals that were unconsumed and were not the perquisites of the priests would probably not be more than were necessary to supply the feast which followed Solomon's national sacrifice.

The occasion would be one to stir the soul of the young king. We can imagine how a youth of twenty years must have felt at such a time. He was firmly established on the throne, his enemies had been subdued, and one of the greatest and proudest of earth's potentates had honored him by conferring his daughter upon him in marriage. What might he not do with such opportunities? A great career was probably mapped out in his mind, a young man is apt to plan the future at the threshold of active life. To him, thus exalted, comes the dream of the blessing. What to a young man at the beginning his career would be the thing most desired? Solomon chooses wisdom. What would be the choice of a young man in his own day if he were informed that he could have the one thing he most desired? worth thinking over. Judging by the eagerness displayed in the pursuit of wealth, it is likely that many would choose riches. Some might choose political advancement. How many would choose wisdom? Probably few, yet still, as it was with Solomon, it is the best choice, the one that has in it the greatest promise of happiness and usefulness. Solomon's choice pleased the Lord and he gave in addition the things he had not asked for. To all men comes a similar message from the lips of our Lord: Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.

That I may discern between good and evil. The ability to do that is very important. Many go wrong through lack of it. They are deceived and fall before temptation. But as Solomon found, something more was needed to a religious life. No man knew better than he what was right, but what was wrong, but he lacked the power to do the right and avoid the wrong. Many are like him, doing wickedly, under a misapprehension, but with a correct knowledge that what they are doing is wrong. "There is no need to tell me of the sin and folly of drunkenness," said a degraded victim of the intoxicating cup. "I know them better than you do. I love and loathe myself for yielding to it but it holds me captive like a child in the grasp of a giant. I resolve I will not touch it, but if I smell it or see it, I cannot resist. I have had delirium tremens and the doctors tell me that if I have it again I shall die, but I must have the drink, cost what it may." Something more is necessary to the blessing Solomon asked and that can have from Christ.

Behold it was a dream. But it was a dream Solomon would never forget. It brought clearly before him his chief need, and he received definite assurance of its being supplied. Like the dreams of Jacob, Joseph and Daniel, it shed light on his future. This dream, as we are explicitly informed, was supernatural, but it often happened in modern times that natural dreams have shed light on difficult problems. Dr. Buckley, in his work on psychological phenomena, relates an incident of this kind. A man was grappling with an arithmetical problem and failed to solve it. He went to bed and to sleep. In his dream the problem still disturbed him. He thought he saw his old school-master, who upbraided him with his clumsiness. "I am ashamed of you," he thought the old man said. Sitting down by him he showed him how the problem should be solved. When the man awoke he remembered the mode adopted by the schoolmaster in his dream, tried it, and successfully solved the problem.

I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked. God does so very often. The really important thing is to be right with God and if a man sets his heart upon that and does not crave riches as his chief goal, God seeing that he may be trusted with them, gives them to him. A quaint writer, discoursing on this theme, said: See there two snails. One hath a house on his back, the other hath none. Both are only snails, and it is a question which of them is better off. He that hath a house hath more shelter; he that hath none hath more freedom; the privilege of covering involves a burden. You see if I have but a stone to climb over, how I strive and strain because of the load on my back and if the passage is strait I find no entrance; whereas the empty snail goes easily. If he misses the shelter, he bears no burden. The wise man is he who is content with his lot. If he has no riches he does not have the responsibility of the Riches are a burden and a snare.

Japan's Great Mart.

Busy City of Osaka, its People, and its Institutions and Missionary Activity.

OSAKA has been called the Venice of Japan, its many canals and branching river, and its innumerable bridges reminding the traveler of the beautiful Italian city. But there the resemblance ceases. Factories of all kinds and people busily intent on their trade and the making of money give no reminder of Venice, but of New York or Chicago. Osaka, with its half million of population, the centre of a district containing double that number, is the busiest and most commercial spirit. It does a large trade in temple furnishings and rosaries, and the brocade triangles which cover the shelves that in Japanese houses support the household idols.

Letters from the missionaries and the reports of Christian visitors to Japan have since the close of the war with China, taken a somewhat gloomy tone. Mission work has evidently received a check, which, it is hoped, is only temporary, but for the time is unmistakable. The statistics of the missionary bodies show no increase in the number of members, and in some instances they have not made up the losses caused by death. The view taken by Rev. Satori Kato, which was published in this journal, has been justified by events. It is evident that the work of reaching the Japanese must be done by native evangelists, and that the missionary societies will have to concentrate their efforts on the training of these men, who know how to meet Japanese prejudices and to preach effectively in their difficult language. The present difficulty appears to have arisen mainly through a lack of training in these men. It is matter for regret, too, that some church buildings and Christian institutions appear to have fallen under the control of men who do not hold in their integrity the essential doctrines of Christianity. This difficulty has arisen from the Japanese law, which does not permit the foreigner to hold real estate outside certain concessions. The property has, therefore, been vested in Japanese trustees, and in the case of the

The Language of Jesus.

IN a recent work by the distinguished Dr. Arnold Meyer, of the University of Bonn, entitled "Jesus Mutter-sprache" (Jesus's Mother-tongue), the very interesting subject of the language in which the Master spoke during his earthly ministry is ably discussed. From a translation prepared by The Literary Digest, we take the following extract:

"The question as to the language spoken by Jesus did not particularly interest the earliest Church fathers. They confined themselves in this regard to the question as to the original language employed by Matthew in the preparation of his gospel, which, Papias declares, was 'Hebrew.' The current opinion was that the Lord had employed the 'Syriac' as his vernacular, which term was used interchangeably with 'Hebrew' and 'Chaldee.' This was the settled tradition of the Church down to the Reformation and later, and when in 1555 Widmanstadt published the first edition of the New Testament in Syriac, this work was greeted with a warm welcome on the ground that now the Church possessed the very words of contemporary of St. Paul, and by the historian Josephus, who calls it the 'language of the fatherland.'

"Only in one respect the old Hebrew maintained its hold. It was the language of the sacred writings of Israel and the official tongue of their Scriptures. In the synagogues these books were read in the original Hebrew, but were interpreted to the people through Aramaic paraphrases called Targumim. Testimonies abound and agree that such was the case regularly, so that the common people could no longer understand the sacred tongue of their fathers and of their Scriptures. The current language of the day was accordingly the Aramaic, and this language beyond any reasonable doubt was the tongue employed by Christ in his discourses with his disciples and with the people. The Hebrew as such was known well only to the learned, but was not understood thoroughly by the common people.

"The correctness of this conclusion is attested by the words cited in the New Testament. The names of persons taken from other sources than the Greek are Aramaic in form and sound, as are also the terms found in 1 Cor. xvi. 22, and the citation from the Psalms spoken by Christ on the cross; also Mark iii. 17; vii. 34; v. 41, and others.

"It is accordingly only fair to conclude that Christ spoke the language of his people. In fact it is even probable that we can conclude that of this Aramaic he spoke the Galilean dialect. At that time three dialects of this tongue were used in Palestine, namely, the Jerusalem, the Samaritan, and the Galilean. Peter, in the night when Christ was before Pilate, was betrayed by the fact that he spoke the 'Galilean' tongue. It is well known that the Galilean was the mother-tongue of Jesus. In this dialect he called his disciples, addressed the multitudes, uttered his parables, delivered the Sermon on the Mount, and he employed it throughout his ministry. Just what the exact form of this dialect was we know from the so-called 'Jerusalem Talmud,' written in the third and fourth centuries after Christ in the city of Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee. This work is written in the popular tongue of Galilee, and is the only work, either of a religious or secular kind, extant in the exact dialect spoken by

view was first promulgated by Inchofer in 1648.

"A century later another Jesuit scholar, Hardouin, assigned as a new reason for this view the fact that the Vulgate, or official Bible of the Roman Catholic Church, was also written in the Latin language. On the other hand, Protestant scholars began to maintain that Jesus spoke Greek, the language of the New Testament. So good an authority as the late Professor Delitzsch believed that Christ spoke a relatively pure Hebrew, the study of this language having been rigidly taught in the schools of Palestine.

"The facts in the case, especially as seen in the words of the New Testament other than Greek, show that the Lord spoke an Aramaic language, and of this language again a Galilean dialect. The Aramaic is a branch of the north Semitic, and as such a sister tongue of the Hebrew. Long before the close of the Old Testament canon, the Aramaic had supplanted Hebrew in popular use in Israel and had become the universal language of trade and business between the peoples of Syria and countries farther East. Already a Jeremiah and an American Board an unhappy difference of opinion has arisen as to the terms of this ownership. It is evident that the mission work in Japan is passing through a crisis.

Writing to the Church at Home and Abroad recently, on the situation, Dr. T. T. Alexander, a professor in a Christian college in Tokio, says: "The lower and peasant classes are still powerfully under the influence of the past and largely Buddhist in faith. The middle classes are more hopeful, but still largely indifferent, not to say hostile, toward Christianity; while the higher classes, for the most part, are sceptical and distant in their attitude. To meet these hard conditions and overcome them is the problem. Many thoughtful and earnest Japanese preachers and laymen are giving their time and strength to its solution. But a higher type of Christian living in the Church, a deeper consecration and sense of responsibility and most of all a baptism of the Holy Ghost are the desiderata at present. I bespeak for the struggling Church militant in Japan the earnest prayers and the helpful sympathy of all in Christian lands who love the cause of Christ.

BIRD'S EYE VIEW OF OSAKA.

surprising of all Japanese cities, and its manufactures are to be found in every part of the empire. It once had a magnificent castle and fortress dating from the sixteenth century, but only the ruined walls now remain, the place having been destroyed by fire. The chief pride now is its arsenal, in which the great guns that battered down the pride of the Chinese empire, are made, and the mint where the coins are produced that are rapidly monopolizing the worship which the Japanese once gave to their innumerable idols. So much Japan has learned by her contact with Europeans and Americans and by the sedate force of circumstances. Her thrift, enterprise, and commercial genius have developed with almost incredible rapidity, and at Osaka they are even more conspicuous than in her greater sister, Tokio. The pictures on this page are reproductions from photographs of some of the characteristic scenes of the commercial metropolis.

Osaka has not altogether, in form at least, parted from her ancient religion to Mammoth worship. Many rich and splendid temples still rear their heads heavenward and attract a multitude of worshippers. It sometimes puzzles the traveler to understand how these buildings stand in a country where earthquakes are so frequent. A visit to the Daikoku or vault, however, explains the mystery. Hanging from the topmost girder is an enormous pendulum of heavy beams bolted together and reaching almost to the base of the pagoda. When the inevitable vibration comes and the tall buildings sway, the pendulum slowly swings and restores the building to its perpendicular. Near one of the pagodas is a tall tower which is devoted to the welfare of the children. There tearful mothers go with the life of a little one hangs in the balance to pray and obtain the sacred water and the wooden shavings or prayers which are thought to have healing virtues, if cast into the reservoir in the courtyard. There, too, is a fountain gushing from the mouth of an enormous turtle while the mother goes when all is over, plunging into the gushing water a wooden tablet bearing the name of her dead darling, hoping that the current may carry it to Yadda and gain his favor for the departed spirit. Osaka also boasts a large Buddhist monastery, and has an annual Buddhist celebration which attracts priests from all parts of the empire. But even in its religious character, Osaka shows the

Quaint Indian Legends,

Current in the Folk-Lore of the Indians of the Northwest.

AN INDIAN SQUAW.

HE red men of the forest are rapidly disappearing as civilization progresses, but many of the quaint legends and traditions of the different tribes have been preserved in literary form by American and European students of the Indian race. A few of these recently collected by a traveler are given briefly below:

The Vancouver Indians hold that Quawteah is the Supreme Being—the originator of all things. The first Indian was named after him, and it was he who named all the tribes, and who taught men all the arts. Before his day men lived in holes in the ground, until he taught them to make an axe out of the elk's horn, and cut down the cedar trees and make board lodges. Formerly they could not fish, but caught salmon in immense weirs thrown across rivers, or at river-mouths. He taught them to chisel out a canoe; but it was a fatal art, for then they went from home and engaged in war, and from that day to this the Indians have been on the decrease. When men die, the all but universal belief among the Indians of the northwest coast is, that they go into birds—a sort of transmigration of souls. Owls are supposed to be the chief recipients of these spirits, and Indians are very careful not to mention the name of the dead. Often when encamped out in the woods with them at night, the Indians, in great affright, would draw over to my fire, and whisper that some one must have been talking about the dead. A woman once begged of me not to shoot a fine specimen of the great owl, because it contained the soul of her grandfather. Of course, I spared the lady's feelings. However, they have also on the west coast of Vancouver Island at least a belief in an after country of bliss, which they describe as a happy country, situated somewhere up in the sky, though not exactly over the earth. Everything there is beautiful and abundant. There a continual calm prevails, and the canoes float lightly on the sleeping waters; frost does not bind the rivers, and the snow never spreads its white blanket over the ground. In this pleasant country of continual sunshine and warmth and gladness, it is believed that the high chiefs, and those natives who have been slain in battle, find their repose, the chiefs living in a large house as the guests of Quawteah, and the slain in battle living in another house by themselves.

In those remote tribes that have not yet been civilized (notably some branches of Arapahoes and Sioux), the members attribute illness to the malevolence of evil-disposed persons—a superstition which has its counterpart in every country. The person who may have bewitched the ill-fated may be a slave, a stranger who has arrived in the camp, or (more likely) a person with whom the sick or dead man may have quarrelled. In such a case, the death of the person is often the only way the bereaved relatives can be consoled. When an Indian quarrels with another, he will say, "You will soon die." As likely as not the threatened person, frightened at the threat, will fall sick or die, in which case the dead man's relatives may take the first opportunity of shooting his "bewitcher."

Among their folk-lore tales are some that might be reasonably identified with certain pretty tales current in the nursery of the white race, including wonderful stories of bears and ogres and such like fancies. Every hill has a tale attached to it; every silent lake frequented by the Indian is the subject of a tradition, and the number of these stories is very great. On the Snoqualami Prairie, in Washington, is a large rock, and the story connected with it is that once on a time this rock was suspended from heaven, but the Great Spirit, offended at the improper conduct of some minor deity and his innamorata, cut the rope, when it dropped down on the prairie. Their gods are of like passions with themselves. The conversion of human beings into animals, shows a striking similarity to Greek and Roman mythology.

The Northwest American Indians have no decided theory on the subject of the creation of the world. The world was always as it is now—a big, flat plain, and if they have any further notions about it, I have not yet been able to clearly ascertain them. Most Indian tribes have some tradition or another about a great flood which once covered their country, but in most cases these are merely "myths of observation." They see shells, rolled stones, and bones of whales, or other marine animals, high on mountains, and they then set their wits to discover how they could possibly have come there. The tribe among whom a particular tradition is extant may be pagans, to whom no teacher of religion has come, but these people are so fond of mythological lore, that a curious another decade of like progress will go very far toward eliminating the once turbulent element, except, perhaps, in a very few localities. Many of the Hampton students are excellent Christian teachers, whose influence and example are producing the best results, winning many from careers of violence and crime to lives of industry and peace, and spreading the light of the Gospel in the tents of darkness and superstition.

The Hardest Road in Palestine.

Writing from the East, Rev. C. L. Goodell gives this graphic description of a rugged Syrian highway: From Baalbek to Hebron there is no road more difficult than that from Bethel to Jericho. In a gentle rain we ride out from our camping-place and face the east. The horses that have been so sure-footed do not fail us today. Over loose stones and across slippery ledges they pass in safety. About two miles to the east of Bethel we passed a rocky, desolate hill. We approach it with reverence, for this is no less a place than the ancient Ai. It is now called El Tell, or "The Heap." There are many Tells in Palestine, but this is the only one distinguished as "The Heap."

The student of Old Testament history will feel the force of it as he recalls the story of the great flood will permeate from tribe to tribe in a hundred conceivable ways.

The Indians point out constellations and give them the names of animate and inanimate objects. For instance, the "milky way" is a collection of fishes; the Pleiades are three men in a canoe, and so on. The sun is a great chief, driving a fiery sledge, and the old people, when they wake up in the morning and see it rising, will often be heard to say, "There goes my lord the sun; he's a great traveler." The moon is also a human being, and is worshipped. The Cowichan tribes think that the moon has a frog in it—a superstition equivalent to ours of "the man in the moon." Among the Aht, or Western Vancouver Indians, the moon is the husband, and the sun (not as among the eastern coast Indians) is the wife. The moon is among all the heavenly bodies the highest object of veneration.

Our Indian photographs on this page present the red man in his uncivilized state—a condition which is, fortunately, becoming less frequent every year. The splendid civilizing and Christianizing work of the Hampton Institute and other agencies is gradually transforming the once-savage tribesmen into quiet, industrious, and peaceful citizens. Returned Indian students of the Hampton Institute are now settled among their Indian brothers and sisters in many parts of the West and Northwest, some as teachers, catechists, and missionaries; others as farmers, tradesmen, and school employees. Some are in the Indian Territory working among the Cherokees, Osages, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, Comanches, Apaches, Chickasaws, Choctaws, Pottawatomies, Kaws, and Creeks. Others are in North and South Dakota among the Standing Rock Indians, the Pine Ridge and Rosebud bands, the Yanktons, Poncas, Santees, Brules, and Sissetons. Ten years have witnessed a marked change in the character of our Indian population, and worlds of the historian: "Joshua burnt Ai and made it an heap forever, even a desolation unto this day." The way in which Joshua worked his famous strategy is plain as we look over the contour of the country round about. To the north is the deep valley where Joshua and his army were located; on the west the five thousand were stationed (Josh. 8: 3-30); and to the east is the place where the battle was fought.

There are many piles of stone hereabout. We are now upon the road along which many pilgrims go. Little mounds of stone are to be seen frequently by the roadside, erected as pious memorials. As these little piles are made, the pilgrims are accustomed to say, "O stones, I witness with thee to-day! Witness thou with me on the Resurrection day!"

of these gigantic slabs, recent explorations have brought to light letters and numbers in red, still clear and distinct, which have been deciphered as the special marks of the Phœnician masons of the days of Hiram, King of Tyre.

For many centuries, Jerusalem was a focus of industrial activity, and its craftsmen, artisans, and artificers constituted an important part of the population. Many of the practical arts had been learned from Egypt and Phœnicia. Certain trades began to flourish in Israel during the days of the Judges, but not until the reign of the "wise king" were architecture and the kindred trades encouraged. Some of the trades had powerful guilds or organizations, and in the Talmud mention is made of tailors, glaziers, builders, goldsmiths, plasterers, shoemakers, and blood-letters or doctors. A few pursuits were less highly thought of, but labor, as a whole, was honored and even influential. Some of the trades were assigned to special families, thus in Jeremiah (37: 21), we read of "the bakers' street," while the Mishna, Josephus, and other authorities mention of other localities of like character. Masons and workers in stone ranked high among the handicrafts. They are mentioned repeatedly in the Holy Scriptures as well as in the Jewish writings. (See I. Chron. 14: 1; Kings 12: 12 and 22; II. Sam. 5: 1; I. Chron. 24: 12; Ezra 3: 7.)

To-day, those once famous handicrafts have almost disappeared among the Levantines. The workmen engaged in the trades in Jerusalem and elsewhere in Palestine are usually Syrians, of the class which the interesting group in our colored illustration on the first page belong to. These Syrian stone-masons have bright, intelligent faces, and it is evident that they comprehend quite clearly the master-workman, who stands before them, expects them to do. With stone-cutting is not a lost art, as the work can testify; for whether they undertake the repair or renovation of some ancient edifice, or the erection of new and pretentious buildings, they are equally sure to do satisfactory, though slow work. All their methods and their tools are primitive by comparison with ours, and the use of labor-saving machinery is practically unknown in Syria.

A Persecuted Evangelist.

A pastor, while recently traveling in Russia, wrote that, at a small meeting of Muscovite evangelists, which he convened in St. Petersburg, one of the number, who came from the centre of Russia, told him how he had gone into a village and preached the Gospel. They laid hold of him and put him in the form of crucifixion. They stripped him, put him against the wall of a drinking-house, and beat him most cruelly. Then they took him down, and put him on one stage, to the next village. There the inhabitants beat him again, and took him on to another village. His bones were already broken.

Then there was a cry went up to beat him again, but the people said, "We beat him again he will die, and we will bring trouble upon ourselves." So he was taken to the hospital, where he was partially recovered, but in the midst of weakness and pain he counted it an honor to have been called to suffer for the name of the Saviour whom he loved. There are many brave Christians in Russia who, at different times, have been subjected to similar persecution.

Anenia's Heroine

Home Again.

Dr. Grace N. Kimball Returns from Van—
Thanks the Readers of "The Christian Herald" for their Gifts, which saved Thousands of Lives.

SLIM-BUILT, bright-eyed, business-looking little woman walked down the gang-plank of the ocean passenger steamship St. Louis, on Saturday, Sept. 19th. She was not heralded by a roar of cannon nor greeted by bands of music nor welcomed by crowds such as usually assemble to greet some famous arrival on these shores; yet this little woman whose coming was known only to a little party of friends, had just concluded years of service of a character that would win her the warmest love and admiration of America and the gratitude of Christian people throughout the world. Dr. Grace N. Kimball, the missionary worker of Van, in Armenia, the St. Louis passenger, is already well-known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as the devoted missionary who, when that whole country was deluged in blood, through the terrible massacres of Christians, remained at her post and besides sheltering the fugitives and tending the wounded, established a system of relief which resulted in saving many lives. How our readers became identified with that glorious work at a most critical time and by their generous gifts expanded it and made it instrumental in saving thousands from starvation has already been told in these columns in the published correspondence of the missionaries at the front.

Dr. Kimball, who visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office on the day of her arrival said: "I desire to thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its proprietor and editors, and through its columns also to thank the Christian people of America for the noble aid in which they responded to Armenia's appeal for help. Your gifts came like a blessing from heaven, at a time when we were in sorest distress, and through your generosity thousands have been saved from starvation and untold sufferings averted."

Dr. Kimball, whose trying experiences brought her almost to the verge of physical collapse, found it absolutely necessary to return to this country to regain her health. She has not passed through the deauncatation for she shows evidences of thoughtful strain in many ways. She came with her from Van sixteen Armenian whom she had aided in rescuing during the fearful massacre of last June. This party which includes several women, arrived on the steamer Marsala, Dr. Kimball having shipped them from Hamburg. Some were then servants at the Mission, and connected with it in several ways, a big true, earnest, Christian people. The money for their transportation was supplied by Dr. Kimball from her own slender means but she felt constrained to do this in order to leave them behind, in the present condition of affairs, would have been to expose them to peril of death at any moment at the hands of the fanatical Moslems. A sum has been appropriated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund to enable Dr. Kimball to forward these refugees to points in the South and West where they will be cared for by friends and provided with suitable employment.

Armenia is a vast graveyard, where people martyred parents and the friends of a great army of helpless little children, whose home now left to the cruel mercies of the Christian-hating Mohammedans. Perhaps the story of the orphans of Armenia may never be fully told; it is too terrible, too harrowing for the ears and the sensibilities of men and women in such land as ours, where our Saviour's mission of kindness toward the little ones is everywhere known and widely obeyed. No Armenian children are permitted by the Porte to leave Turkey. They are good Moslems by-and-by, and the Moslems, when grown to manhood, will fight the battles of the Sultan and even lay Christians who may oppose them.

When received from a missionary of the American Board of Foreign Missions, stationed in Armenia for many years, but at present visiting this country, two photographic groups of school children of Cesarea and the neighboring town of Talas.

The missionary writes of them as follows: "These children are all orphans. One of the most difficult problems at present is what to do for the orphans and widows, whose numbers have been so vastly augmented by the massacres."

One of the photographs—a group of girls—is presented on this page. The sad, grave faces of these little orphans must touch many hearts. They will be fortunate children, indeed, if the missionaries succeed in keeping them out of Mohammedan control.

Letters from different points in the interior show the condition of affairs to be gradually improving, as far as the suffering is concerned in some districts, while it is unchanged in others. A Mardin writer says: "The situation does not improve because there is no increased security for life and property of Christians."

From Bitlis come details as to the Garjagan district, in the Van province, but nearer Bitlis city. Out of twenty-seven villages nine to thirteen are reported as wholly plundered, and seven to ten as partially plundered. People killed are almost wholly male adults—the bread winners—leaving a large number of widows and orphans. Out of a population of from 5,000 to 8,000 some five hundred were killed. Massacres were almost simultaneous on 8 p.m., June 19. Owing to this massacre the people were unable to give the last necessary irrigation to the fields, hence the crops are largely ruined.

Dream-Life of the Bible.

No subject has more universally fascinated philosophers of all ages, than that of dreams; and very numerous and plausible, are the theories formed, regarding them. I pass them all by, for it is not possible to explain by human reason, things surpassing human reason. And what philosopher can tell me the operations of my mind, when he knows nothing of his own? Therefore, it is not any theory of dreams, but dreams themselves which are worthy to be considered; and this chiefly because they prove in a very forcible way, the separate existence of the soul. Dormant and incapable of motion lies the sleeping body; but its companion—controlled, yet uncontrolled, dependent yet independent, and bound to its tenement of clay—is yet free to wander very far off; and to meddle in actions and events of which its keeper is quite unconscious.

Who has not suffered and rejoiced in dreams, with an intensity quite impossible to waking hours? Who, in dreams, has not striven with things impossible, and accomplished them, without even a feeling of surprise? Ah, dreams reveal to us powers and possibilities for the soul, which we never realize, until this mortal puts on immortality!

For five thousand years, there has been a certain sacred recognition of the verity of the impalpable teachers of humanity. But the shadowy land of dreams rests upon the terra firma of revelation. The dream literature of the Bible comprises some of its most delightful and important passages. By a self-interpreting dream, Abimelech was preserved from sin; and Abraham's honor saved. God did not the less confirm, and fulfil, all his promises to Jacob, because they were made in a dream; nay, but in a second dream he encourages Jacob by the memory of his first dream, saying, "I am the God of Bethel, where thou anointedst the pillar, and where thou vowedst a vow." Take the dream-life out of Joseph's history, and you take from it much of its spirituality and beauty.

All through the historical part of the Bible, this spiritual world presses close on its humanity; while the sublimity and beauty of the prophecies is nowhere more remarkable than in the dreams of these spiritual sentinels of the people. In all the realms of poetry, where can there be found anything to equal that prophetic dream of millennium peace which Zachariah saw; of the angel standing among the myrtle trees, and the angelic horsemen walking to and fro in the happy earth? Would to God the days were come in the which these holy watchers might always report, "Behold, all the earth sitteth still, and is at rest!"

Everyone is familiar with the dreams of the New Testament. By one, the life of the infant Saviour is preserved; by another he is called out of Egypt. There seems, however, to have been always a distinction between visions and dreams. Visions simply the agency of an angel; but dreams occur in that state which Job so beautifully describes—complaining at the same time of man's dullness of spiritual perception—God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not; in a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon man in slumberings upon the bed, etc.

MRS. AMELIA E. BARR.

There is one remarkable thing about the dream-life of the Bible which may be left to individual thought—the fact that these spiritual and prophetic dreams were not given to women. It is the men of Bible History, who see visions and dream dreams. Only one exception to this rule is recorded the dream concerning Christ, which was given to the pagan wife of Pilate; but of this dream we are told no particulars. Why was this distinction made? Was the masculine soul then more apprehensive and comprehensive? more prescient and spiritual than the feminine one? Individual speculations on this subject would be highly interesting.

Can we declare that God has ceased so to speak to man? Are there not in every Christian life, exigencies and sorrows, which He only knows and in which He only can give comfort and counsel? And I pity that Christian whose spiritual life has never touched the boundaries of the Invisible—to whom God has never sent secret intelligences, either in his waking or sleeping hours.

Who has not watched a baby sleep and smile, and smile and sleep? Tell me, now—you who hold to "association of ideas," what ideas has this infant of days? How many sources of pleasant impressions from this world's objects? Holds it not converse with the angels? For,

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting.
The soul that rises with us, our life's Star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar:
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter darkness,
But trailing clouds of glory, do we come
From God: who is our home.
Heaven lies about us in our infancy.

Never has there been an age in which there were so many creeds, and so little faith. People take credit to themselves for being practical and material, forgetting that our spiritual life is beyond all such laws; that it rests entirely on one Spiritual and Miraculous Book, and one Spiritual and Miraculous Life.

The Hymns of Childhood.

It is related that a boy of Scotland had learned to sing the old psalms that were known as household words in the church and by the firesides of that country. When he grew to young manhood, he wandered away from his native country, and was taken captive by the Turks, and made a slave in one of the Barbary States. Eighteen long years were passed in slavery. One evening sailors on board an English man-of-war were surprised to hear the familiar tune of "Old Hundred" come floating to them over the moonlit waves. Quickly arming themselves they found the captive and succeeded in getting back to their vessel without creating an alarm. The old hymn was the means of his restoration to home and friends.

To Our Readers.

WITH the present issue, the colored first page is permanently restored as a weekly feature of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Every issue hereafter will contain a beautiful illustration in colors, in artistic execution and effectiveness greatly surpassing any that have yet been presented in these pages.

In an early issue—probably a few weeks hence—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will begin the publication of a new and exceedingly dramatic story, just completed by America's greatest authoress, Mrs. Amelia E. Barr. This glorious tale, by far the ablest she has ever written, is entitled:

and it interweaves, with one of the most delightful histories of the heart, a study of some of the burning questions of the present day, that are agitating society to its foundations. It is a story that will be a profound revelation to many, and we promise our friends an exceptional pleasure in the reading of "The King's Highway," which Mrs. Barr pictures so grandly and attractively, that all will be enthusiastically drawn to walk therein. As the appearance of the opening chapters will be classed among the notable "literary events" of our time, we trust that our friends will value the opportunity and grasp it accordingly.

Summer Fruit.

WHEN Amos, the prophet, who lived much out-of-doors wanted to extol religion, he compared it to summer fruit. That is, the Gospel, when a man rightly sees it and tastes it, is very pleasant. Whether summer fruit be piled up in the orchard, or on the barn floor, or on the platter of the table, the commingling of green, and gold, and red, and brown in the cheek of the fruit is very fascinating. You know that some artists deal chiefly with pictures of fruit; and while Correggio delights to sketch physical beauty, and Turner drops the sea-foam on the canvas, and Cuyper drives up his cattle at evening tide, and Rosa Bonheur catches by the halter the rearing steeds at the "Horse Fair," and Edward Landseer whittles up the dogs, there are many of our modern painters who are putting all their power on fruit pieces, and I do not wonder at it. There is beauty in fruit indescribable. So it is with the Gospel of Christ. It charms the young and the old, the healthy and the sick, the wise and the ignorant. It has the glitter of the wave, the aroma of flowers, the fascination of music. It is the luxury of the ages. Religion is not an abess—there is not a cenobite. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." In June, 1815, there was a noble party gathered in a house in St. James's Square, London. The Prince Regent was present, and the occasion was made fascinating by music, and banqueting, and by jewels. While a quadrille was being formed, suddenly all the people rushed to the windows. What is the matter? Henry Percy had arrived with the news that Waterloo had been fought, and that England had won the day. The dance was abandoned; the party dispersed; lords, ladies, and musicians rushed into the street and, in fifteen minutes from the first announcement of the good news, the house was emptied of all its guests. O, ye who are seated at the banquet of this world, or whirling in its gayeties or frivolities, if now you could hear the sweet strains of the Gospel trumpet announcing Christ's victory over sin, and death, and hell, you would rush forth, glad in the eternal deliverance. The Waterloo against sin has been fought, and our Commander-in-Chief has won the day.

Oh, the joys of this salvation! I do not care what metaphor, what comparison you have; bring it to me that I may use it. Amos shall bring one simile, Isaiah another, David another, John another. Beautiful with pardon. Beautiful with peace. Beautiful with anticipations.

Right Side and Wrong Side.

HERE are persons who, from childhood, while they are not at all petulant, yet show a sad and melancholy turn of mind which seems ineradicable. Although their lot may be comfortable, they have, all their life long, the appearance of having met with affliction. Others are from infancy light and happy. They romp, they fly. You can hear their swift feet in the hall. Their loud laughter rings through the house, or in the woods bursts into a score of echoes. At night you can hardly hush their glad hearts for slumber, and in the morning they wake you with their singing. Alas! if then they leave you, and you no more hear their swift feet in the hall, and their loud laughter ringing through the house, or in the woods bursting into a score of echoes; if they wake you no more in the morning with their sweet song; if the color go out of the rose, and its leaves fall; if angels for once grow jealous, and want what you cannot spare; if packed away in the trunk or drawer there be silent garments that once fluttered with useful life, and by mistake you call some other child by the name of the one departed. Ah, me! Ah, me!

Like most garments, like most carpets, everything in life has a right side and a wrong side. You can take any joy, and by turning it around, find trouble on the other side; or you may take the greatest trouble, and by turning it around, find joys on the other side. The gloomiest mountain never casts a shadow on both sides at once, nor does the greatest of life's calamities. The earth, in its revolutions, manages about right; it never has darkness all over at the same time. Sometimes it has night in America, and sometimes in China; but there is some part of the earth constantly in the bright sunlight. When you have trouble, keep turning around, and you will find sunlight somewhere. Amid the thickest gloom through which you are called to pass, carry your own candle. A consummate fret will in almost every instance come to nothing. You will not go to such a merchant's store, nor employ such a mechanic, nor call such a minister. Fretfulness will kill anything that is not in its nature immortal. There is a large class of persons in constant trouble about their health, although the same amount of strength in a cheerful man would be taken as healthiness. Their digestion, being constantly suspected of unfaithfulness, finally refuses to serve such a master, and says, "Hereafter make way with your own lobsters," and the suspicious lungs resign their office, saying, "Hereafter blow your own bellows."

The Printing-Press.

THE newspaper is the greatest educator of the nineteenth century. There is no force compared with it. It is book, pulpit, platform, forum, all in one. And there is not an interest—religious, literary, commercial, scientific, agricultural, or mechanical—that is not within its grasp. All our churches, and schools, and colleges, and asylums, and art-galleries feel the quaking of the printing-press. I wish I could bring to your parlors the periodicals that are worthy of the Christian fireside, and try to pitch into the gutter of scorn and contempt those newspapers that are not fit for the hand of your child or the vision of your wife. In our pulpit we preach to a few hundreds or thousands of the people; the newspaper addresses an audience of twenty thousand, fifty thousand, or two hundred thousand. We preach three or four times a week; they every morning or evening of the year. If they are right, they are gloriously right; if they are wrong, they are awfully wrong.

I find no difficulty in accounting for the world's advance. Four centuries ago, in Germany, in courts of justice, men fought with their fists to see who should have the decision of the court; and if the judge's decision was unsatisfactory, then the judge fought with the counsel. Many of the lords could not read the deeds of their own estates. What has made the changes?

"Books," you say.

No, sir! The vast majority of citizens do not read books. The newspaper under God has done the glorious work. In the clanking of the printing-press, as the sheets fly out, I hear the voice of the Lord Almighty proclaiming to all the dead nations of the earth—"Lazarus, come forth!" And to the retreating surges of darkness—"Let there be light!" In many of our city newspapers, professing no more than secular information, there have appeared during the past ten years some of the grandest appeals in behalf of religion, and some of the most effective interpretations of God's government among the nations.

Useful Invalidism.

TAKE from the world the work of the invalids, and you make an appalling subtraction. Robert Hall an invalid. Edward Payson an invalid. Richard Baxter an invalid. The men of Bryan in Ireland heard that the battle had gone against their country, and they said: "We are too weak to stand up and fight, but you drive some stakes into the ground, and then carry us out of the hospital and fasten us to the stakes, and then we will fight with the other arm." And so it was done. The stakes were driven into the ground, these wounded men were brought out of the hospital. Not able to stand alone, they were fastened to these stakes by the one side, and with the other arm they fought to desperation, and fought to death. The great victories for God and the truth have not been gained by those who have full equipment. John Milton saw further without eyes than thousands of men ever saw with them. Look out for the soldier's crutch and the old man's staff if they be wielded for patriotism or Christianity. In garrets, in cellars, in sick-rooms, in hospitals, how many of the Lord's troops! Some in one way and some in another way efficient for good.

Many a man with one arm has accomplished more for the kingdom of Christ than others with two arms. It is not the number of guns we carry, but the way we unlimber them. It is not our grandeur of opportunity, but the use we make of it. With two eyes and two ears and two feet we may not be worth the space we occupy, while many an invalid has made his wheeled chair a conqueror's chariot.

BRIEF NOTES.

As we are in Constant Receipt of many letters regarding Premiums, we must request our readers to please take notice we have no more:

- "Pathway of Life,"
- "Wild Flowers of Palestine,"
- "The Rule of the Turk,"
- "Helps to the Study of the Bible."

Please do not write concerning these premiums. We have no more on hand and consequently cannot fill your orders.

Mr. John H. Wyburn, long identified with Rescue work in New York City, has been appointed Superintendent of the Bowery Mission. Mr. Wyburn, a thorough man of God, is peculiarly qualified for this work, and his labors will undoubtedly contribute to larger spiritual results yet been attained. Very interesting mission services were held on Friday last, which was the eighth anniversary of Mr. Wyburn's conversion. Mr. Wyburn will be ably assisted by Mr. D. Talmage Merston, a nephew of the editor of this journal.

The Christians (or Disciples of Christ) of Minnesota gave more than ten dollars per capita to benevolent purposes last year.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of Baltimore, Md., provided the means for sending children from the slums of the city to the country two weeks each.

During the Past Twelve Months there have been 7,527 inquests held in London. Of the number of cases in which the verdict was, "death by starvation," was 107.

A Journey of One Hundred and Ten miles was taken recently in a wagon by a party of Christian Endeavorers in South Dakota in order to visit the State Convention.

The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church reports as its total revenue for nine months $718,175, against $659,450 for the corresponding period of the preceding year. This includes the sums received for the raising of the debt.

The Rescue Mission Workers of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City have arranged for a monthly conference for consultation and encouragement. The September conference took place on September 17 at the Wilson Memorial Hall, West Forty-second street, New York.

Statistics published in The Moravian show that there were in the United States alone in the close of 1895, 20,795 members of that body; in Great Britain and Ireland about 6,000, and on the European Continent about 7,000, making a total of 33,800; three home provinces. They support 345 missions in heathen lands.

A Congregational Church in Minneapolis, which a few years ago was reduced to one member and he a non-resident, is now flourishing. A year created a parsonage and raised $1,000. The change is due, under the blessing of God, to the men who were converted and threw themselves with enthusiasm into religious work.

Baltimore, Md., has Suffered the Loss of a benefactor in the death of Mr. Enoch Pratt, took place on Sept. 17. Mr. Pratt went to the city in 1831 from New England, taking with him a capital of $100. He amassed a large fortune. In 1882 presented the city with a Free Library, which cost him $1,145,833.

Few Churches have a Better Record than the Simpson Methodist Episcopal Church, Detroit, which recently received about one hundred twenty-five probationers into full connection. It is a result of revival services last winter. The five years' pastorate of Rev. Dr. S. W. H. Church has made a net gain of four hundred members.

The American Board Closed its Fiscal Year on August 31, with a balance in its treasury of $114,632 for the removal of the debt which the Board began the year. The total figures were $627,966. These figures do not include the sums forwarded by the Board for relief Armenia, which amounted to $130,036.

Commander Ballington Booth of the Italian Volunteers, was ordained in Chicago a member of the Evangelical Churches. Bishop officiated, and ministers were present from the Congregational, Methodist, and Presbyterian Churches. Commander Booth made a declaration that of the Volunteers was to be auxiliary to the churches in reaching people whom the churches did not reach.

Two of the American Board Missionaries to the Hawaiian Islands, the Rev. Dr. Elias B. Bond was a native of Hallowell, Me., a graduate of Bowdoin College and Bangor Theological Seminary, and went in 1840 as a missionary, and gained the love of the Hawaiian people. Cooke and her husband went out in 1857.

An Outbreak of Persecution is Reported from Mexico. On Sept. 15, a lawless mob attacked the Presbyterian Church at Aguas Calientes, the following day the Morelos Protestant Church in the same city. They broke all the windows and did other damage. The Government is making strenuous efforts to discover the leaders and mete out severe punishment to them.

The Mission Stations in the Districts of Madagascar occupied by the French are suffering severely. A dispatch to the London Missionary Society announces that over two hundred stations have been destroyed by the insurgents against the French regime. The French commander is unable to protect the stations which were destroyed by the invasion. One good feature is that the natives have no loss of life to report.

The effort to Organize a conference in New York for Bible study and for the deepening of spiritual life similar to those held at Northampton recently in this column, has been successful. It is expected that the meetings will be held in the second week of November at the residence of Mr. Moody. These will be full of evangelistic services especially for Christians. It is expected that the meetings will be held at the residence of Rev. A. C. Dixon, and held in the afternoon at the same place. In the evening evangelistic services will be held in churches in several districts of the city.

In the City of the Sultan.

LIFE in Constantinople during the past few weeks appears from the cable dispatches to have been a series of panics. One day there is a mutiny of troops guarding the Sultan's palace, the Minister of War has to go to suppress it by force. Another day, there is a riot of the Young Turkish party and the streets are in flames. No one knows what may occur and the apprehension of danger is general. The dispatches declare that the lives of foreigners of all nationalities are in peril. That this is no exaggeration is evident from the fact that ships from the English ships were summoned to protect the British Embassy, and afterwards the French and Russian ambassadors followed the example and posted guards of their own nationalities at the embassies. A measure so unusual indicates the anarchic condition prevailing in the city. When foreign ambassadors have fears for their own safety, ordinary peace must be in imminent peril. The Armenians especially, are in danger of another massacre. The frightful slaughter, which followed the seizure of the Ottoman Bank, has gone unpunished. Even the men who murdered inoffensive Armenians and the windows of the British Embassy were fully identified by British witnesses, have been acquitted. The Armenians who were slaughtered in that massacre are now said to number five thousand. They were killed by the mob in the presence of Turkish police and soldiers, who made no attempt to prevent the outrage. Even the seizure of the bank which was made the pretext for the massacre, is now believed to have been a Turkish plot, hatched in the Sultan's palace. The fact of men who occupied the bank being allowed to escape and of their being unconnected with any of the Armenian patriotic associations, as well as the bootless nature of their enterprise as an Armenian demonstration, give color to the suspicion that they were Turks in disguise, or Armenian traitors who lent themselves to the designs of the Sultan. As the facts are disclosed, the indignation of Europe becomes intense, especially in England, where the Government can with difficulty resist the demand of public opinion, that with or without the cooperation of other powers, it shall destroy "the great assassin," who with the ferocity of a maniac is slaughtering his Christian subjects. At present, however, there appears to be little probability of England securing the consent of European powers to her interference, or to her proceeding without it. It is plainly stated that if England attacked the Sultan she would find herself at war with Russia and probably with France, who, to their everlasting disgrace, are protecting the Ottoman miscreant. She is not prepared for so gigantic a conflict, and apparently will have to wait for the agreement of the other powers which may never come. The Sultan doubtless depends on these mutual rivalries for his immunity, but he cannot eventually escape. God will hear the cry that goes up from his martyred people:

"Hail, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not hear, and avenge our blood?" Rev. 6: 10.

A Noted Murderer Caught.

The arrest of P. J. Tynan the famous Not of the Irish Invincibles, who planned the cowardly murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish, in Phoenix Park, Dublin, in 1882 has caused some excitement on both sides of the Atlantic. He has been "wanted" so long and has boasted with so much effrontery of his detestable crime that there is general satisfaction at his being at last in the toils. When it is remembered that Cavendish went to Ireland with the avowed purpose of remedying Irish grievances, and that he was brutally butchered by the people he went to help, just as he was beginning his work, there can be no sympathy in any right mind for the cowardly murderer. The satisfaction at his capture, however, is modified by the fact that he was caught on French soil and therefore may not be surrendered by the French Government. Almost simultaneously two other men were arrested in Rotterdam and another in Glasgow. It is alleged, and proof is said to have been found in incriminating documents in their possession, that the four were engaged in a plot to kill the Emperor of Russia and the English Royal family during the Czar's visit to Scotland. Balmoral Castle was to have been blown up with dynamite. Why the Irishmen should have wished to kill the Czar, with whom they have no quarrel, was not at first apparent; but it is now stated that they were instructed in the use of bombs by a Russian professor, who exacted a promise from them that they should pay him for his tuition by including the Czar in the massacre. It appears that the character of such men has not changed much in the three thousand years that have elapsed since Solomon described them as saying:

Come with us, let us lay wait for blood, let us lurk privily for the innocent without cause; let us swallow them up alive as the grave; and whole, as those that go down into the pit. (Prov. 1: 11, 12.)

Eviction from a Grave.

A conflict between American and Jewish law has arisen out of the careless mistake of the managers of a Jewish cemetery in Brooklyn, N. Y. Three years ago a Jewish merchant died in New York and was buried in Machpelah Cemetery, in the family plot he had purchased some time before. His widow paid visits to the grave at frequent intervals since the burial. She was there a few days ago and was surprised to see a mound, newly turfed, close beside the grave of her husband. Inquiries at the offices of the cemetery elicited the statement that a man had been buried there by mistake, the authorities having overlooked the fact that the whole plot was owned by the widow. She was very indignant, because she had cherished the hope that when she died she would be buried beside her husband, in the very place now occupied by the body of a stranger. She insisted that the body be immediately disinterred and removed from her plot. The cemetery authorities, however, reminded her that Jewish law forbade the removal of dead bodies from the place in which they were buried, and they offered to reserve a place for her as near as possible to her plot. But she would not consent to this arrangement, and has commenced suit for the eviction of the dead intruder from her plot. If she presses her suit the cemetery officials will have to remove the body, in spite of Jewish law, as they had no right to use for one person the land they had sold to another. Their blunder is unfortunate, but happily it cannot do any harm to the man. It is of no concern to him now where his body rests. It is a much more serious thing when people put faith in priests who profess to have the right to secure them an abiding place for their souls.

None of them can redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him. (Ps. 49: 7.)

A Slandered District.

A French civil engineer has recently published a description of the great Sahara Desert in Africa which has caused genuine surprise. He says that the guides purposely conduct caravans over the most arid routes to keep them in a condition of dependency and discourage travel. He was assured by the Tuaregs who conducted his expedition that they would have to march two or three days at a time where no water could be obtained. His geological knowledge, however, made him suspicious of the truth of the statement, and he made short excursions out of the regular route to test it. In every instance he found water, sometimes in streams and sometimes in wells which were carefully concealed. He found rivers which in the spring are full of water, and are, in some cases, three miles wide. The beds of them become fruitful meadows when the water retreats, and was full of honey. He was not believed, but on investigation, the news proved to be true. It took two days to clear out the belfry. The honey and comb weighed nearly seven hundred pounds, and its sale put over a hundred dollars into the treasury of the church. The men who had tried to line the bees and had traced them to the church were greatly mortified to think that they had not looked there for the honey, but they never thought of finding it there. Perhaps, like many other people, they associated the idea of a church with what is sour and disagreeable. If they had made a closer acquaintance with it they would have found the honey, and if they will attend its services with an earnest desire to know the doctrine that is taught there they may learn, as the Psalmist did, that the knowledge of the Lord is Sweeter also than honey and the honey-comb. (Ps. 119: 10.)

An Agricultural Warning.

A notice to New York farmers has been issued by Mr. V. H. Lowe, the State Entomologist. He calls attention to the appearance in various parts of the State of the dreaded Chinch Bug, which is a well-known pest in Kansas, Nebraska, and Ohio. It was reported to the Station at Geneva, N. Y., in 1894, and since that year in increasing numbers. It is found at the foot of grains and grasses, in some instances adhering to the stalk. It does not eat the tissue, having no mouth development. It has, however, a powerful sucker with which it extracts the sap from any grass or plant on which it settles. Mr. Lowe says, that the eggs which are very numerous, usually come to maturity in July or August. They pass through various stages until they appear as a pretty insect, with a dark body almost black, with white wings. A second brood is soon laid which survives the winter, and in spring feeds on the young and tender crops. It attacks chiefly wheat, barley, and Indian corn. When the bug is found in the spring, Mr. Lowe recommends plowing a strip six feet wide around the field, with a deep furrow in the middle. If the sides of the furrow are pulverized almost as fine as dust, the bugs fall into it and, being at that time unable to fly, cannot extricate themselves and die of exhaustion. If it is detected earlier, he advises the burning of the field and afterwards, deep plowing and harrowing. That is always, he thinks, the most effective course. An analogous course is that which God sometimes takes to rid a soul of the sins which prey upon it. The fire, and the deep plowing, and harrowing are experiences many Christians have been called to pass through. They are painful, but as the apostle said:

No chastening for the present seems to be joyous but grievous; nevertheless it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness to them who are exercised thereby. (Heb. 12: 11.)

An Immigrant Detained.

The Immigration Commissioners in New York have an extraordinary case under consideration. Among the immigrants landed last week from Germany was a musician who is an expert on the zither, a peculiarly difficult instrument to play. The man can, not only play it with his hands, in the ordinary way, but can play it either with his nose or his ear. He gave the Commissioners a specimen of his accomplishment which excited their amazement. The reason the man was held for examination was that he had been on trial for the theft of a leg of mutton. As our immigration laws forbid the entrance of criminals, the man was detained. He insisted that he had not been proved guilty of the theft, and contended that, even if he was guilty, so small an offence should not exclude him from the country. He was much incensed when he saw the men who had come with him depart after passing the examination before the Commissioners, and declaimed volubly on the injustice of his being excluded on account of a paltry piece of meat not worth a dollar. He had to learn, as many will have to learn at the last, that it is not by the extent of a man's offence that he is judged. The fact of his offending at all stamped his character as that of a criminal and was sufficient to exclude him. The Government does not want criminals here. The Bible warns us that this principle is applied to those who are excluded from heaven.

Whoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point, is guilty of all. James 2: 10.

The Living Presence.

Sermon Preached by Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, D.D., in the First Baptist Church, Nashville, Tenn. Text: Matt. 28: 18-20, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

JESUS gave this commission to his apostles after his resurrection and just before his ascension. It was a command, not to the eleven apostles only, but to all Christians in that age and in every subsequent age of the world. It is to the inspiring truth contained in the last clause of the text that I would direct your attention this morning—"Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." I cannot see how Unitarianism can live in the burning light of these words. No mere human being ever made a claim so tremendous as this. Christ claims all power in heaven and earth, and promises to be with his people always and everywhere. That means that he is both omnipotent and omnipresent. These attributes belong only to God. When Unitarianism, therefore, says he is not God, it accuses him either of insanity or insincerity.

The Christ of the New Testament is "Immanuel"—God with us. He is not simply an historic personage; he is more than the hero of a buried generation who played his part on the stage of time and then passed into another world. "I am with you always," means that he is personally present with his people everywhere and at every moment of their history. These are not the words of a dead man, but of one who ever liveth. Looking backward we see, all along, on the pathway of the centuries. We see how he has guided human thought, molded human character, and shaped human society. To-day we recognize his personal presence and his mighty power behind every human undertaking that is pushing the world on and up to something better.

It is only when we feel the inspiring presence and the guiding hand of the living Christ that Christian ministers are prepared for the work to which they are divinely commissioned. They are sent forth to conquer the world for Christ; to vindicate his claim to universal homage, and to emancipate our fallen humanity from the power and bondage of sin. In doing this they must encounter indifference, unbelief, prejudice, hatred and persecution. To perform such a work in the face of such difficulties they need a constant sense of the presence and power of their divine Leader.

Jesus said to the apostles, "Ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake." "Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves." The history of these men shows that this prophecy was exactly fulfilled. For their deeds of love they were hated, maligned, imprisoned and put to death. Their experience was prophetic of the trials of the true Christian ministry down to the close of the gospel dispensation. It is true, except in a few countries, that such physical cruelties as the early Christians were subjected to, have ceased. The Turks still massacre and they will continue to do it until Turkey receives her death blow and ceases to exist as a separate nationality. The Christians in some countries still meet with persecution. In others, however, Christian missionaries, burn out chapels and school houses, but the rapid encroachments of Western influence and civilization will soon put an end to these cruelties. Romanism in Mexico, Brazil, and a few other countries, are still repeating the cruelties of the old Spanish Inquisition; but Romanism cannot much longer withstand the sentiment of the civilized world which demands that religion shall everywhere be free.

Opposition to Christianity now is just as intense and bitter as it was when Christians were incarcerated in dungeons and tortured at the stake. The spirit of it is the same from age to age. It changes only in its methods of manifestation. The modern infidel is just as intolerant of the Christian religion as Herod and Nero were. He differs from them only in his methods of warfare. His weapons are not physical, but intellectual. The whole infidel horde is assaulting the very centralities of our faith. They claim that the realities of the universe are limited to the things of which material senses take cognizance. While only a few, comparatively, have absolutely forsaken Christianity and accepted this many have been affected by the audacity of its advocates. It has not put God out of their creeds, but it has put him much further from their thoughts and lives. Proof of this is found in the intense secularism of the age. Millions of people who would not openly deny the existence of God, have dismissed from their minds all thoughts of him, all concern about judgment and eternity, and have surrendered themselves wholly to the pursuit of money and sensuous pleasure.

Even with hundreds who are enrolled as members of Christian churches, belief in God and the world to come is no longer a practical and regulating principle. It does not control them in their business, or their politics, or their pleasures. If there be any God in their thoughts, he is afar off. He is too distant to be consulted about any of their earthly affairs. Not, "What would he have me to do?" but "What will best promote my material interests and my earthly pleasures?" is the question which determines their conduct in every event of their mortal lives. Having shut God out of their hearts and lives, they care nothing for his sanctuary, beyond the æsthetic and intellectual entertainment which they get in listening to the music and the sermon. They do not worship. They are untouched by any sense of God's goodness and mercy to them. They are inspired by no feeling of gratitude. They covet no real personal intercourse with the great Father of Spirits. Every spiritual faculty is closed. To them nothing is real that does not come within the range of their physical senses.

A Source of Inspiration.

Under these circumstances, where is the minister to get inspiration for his work? Where can he get strength commensurate with the magnitude of his undertakings? By what power can he overcome the resistance that confronts him? Christ answered these questions when he said to his apostles, "Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

When Moses was called to the grand enterprise of freeing the enslaved people of Israel, distrustful of himself, he drew back from the herculean task. Knowing the power and cruelty of Pharaoh, and his own weakness, he saw nothing to inspire hope of final success. But at the moment when he was most profoundly impressed with his insufficiency for the mission, Jehovah spoke to him, and assured him that he should go forth to the work, not only with his authority, but with the guidance of his wisdom, and the support of his power. When Moses heard that, he was willing to go. Assured that it was not any ambitious scheme of his own—that he was in no sense self-sent—and that at every step he should feel the touch of God's sustaining hand, he was willing to begin the task.

It must be perfectly apparent to every reader of the sacred narrative, that, amid all the stupendous difficulties of the undertaking, Moses was supported by the belief that it was a work of divine determination, and that a covenant-keeping God had committed himself to its final and complete success. He surmounted every barrier, because at every step he saw the hand and heard the voice of his divine Leader.

I am just as confident that the true minister of Jesus Christ is not self-sent as I am that Moses did not undertake the emancipation of Israel without the warrant of divine authority. Back of my commission to preach the Gospel, and back of every honest preacher's commission, stands that majestic Being who says, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth."

Divine Authority.

Oh, that I had the ability to emphasize this truth as it deserves to be! In view of the magnitude of the work, the difficulties that environ it, and all the trials incident to it; in view of all the intense worldliness of the age; the sceptical thought which everywhere pervades society, and the religious apathy resulting from such scepticism, how much the preacher of the Gospel needs a profound sense of the divine authority in which his commission is rooted and grounded.

I think too much of my life to spend it in attempting impossibilities. I trust that I have too much self-respect to be engaged in such folly. Convince me that I do not stand here by divine authority—that my commission is not stamped with "the eternal heraldry and signature of Almighty God"—and that the Christ whom I preach is not a living and abiding presence, guiding and upholding me in this dark conflict with the enemies of his cause, and you shall never see my face again in this pulpit. If God's authority and God's power are not back of my vocation, my life is worse than a failure. It is a miserable travesty which deserves your deepest reprobation.

"Go, teach all nations; lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." What a transformation these words wrought in the spirit and purposes of the apostles. When Jesus was crucified, they were thrown into utter confusion. They stopped preaching the word of the New Kingdom, and went back to their boats and fishing-nets. After his resurrection, and his appearing to them on the seashore, joy returned. But they did not know when and where, and under what conditions they should begin again the preaching of the Gospel. These last words of the risen Christ removed the mystery and made plain to them the path of duty. "All power is mine. Go preach my Gospel to all nations and I will be with you always and everywhere. When they heard that, doubt and fear forsook them and they were at once inspired by a courage which neither difficulties nor dangers could daunt. The assurance of his personal presence and support wherever they might stand to proclaim the story of his redeeming love turned their timidity into lion-hearted boldness and made them immortal heroes.

Their Hopes Revived—

In saying, "I am with you always, even unto the end of the world," he declared that the kingdom which he had planted by his teachings, sufferings and death, should descend from generation to generation, even to the very end of time. No mere human leader of men was ever audacious enough to assert such a claim and express such a hope. Think of Alexander or Cæsar saying to his subjects: "I have all power in heaven and earth; I will be in the world through every age; and therefore my kingdom shall stand and flourish until time shall be no more."

Vaulting was the ambition of these men; insane at times was their lust for earthly power and glory; yet they never dared to hope for a continuance of their dominion to the end of the world. But here is a man, the son of a carpenter, with a following only of a few humble peasants and Galilean fishermen, who, knowing the chances and changes of fortune, the fickleness of human thought and feeling, is bold enough to proclaim a universal and indestructible kingdom, sustained through all ages by his own personal presence and power. No great temporal monarch could be more serene in suppressing the feeblest and most ephemeral provincial insurrection, than Jesus was in asserting his purpose to rule all human thought, to make himself the centre of all human affection, the giver of all humanity, and the object of universal adoration.

The words, "Lo! I am with you always," do not mean that Christ will be with his people in a merely representative sense. It does not mean that he is with his people as I am present in some distant court through my attorney, or as the Emperor of Germany is present at Washington through his Ambassador. In such the principal is really absent. Christ's promise is that in his own person he will be with his servants everywhere at all times.

I stand here to-day performing the sacred functions of Christian ministry not only by the authority of Christ, but supported by his actual presence and power. The Spirit—the third person of the adorable Trinity—is here to quicken, illumine, and to take of the things of Christ, and show them unto us; but his presence does not preclude the presence of the Second Person of the Trinity—Jesus Christ, the Eternal Son of God.

It is the conviction, or rather the consciousness of Christ's presence that imparts earnestness and power to the "living ministry."

The True Minister

knows the truth because he knows Christ. He knows him, not simply as an historic character, but as an actual living presence. Christ is in him the bread of life, the light of the soul, the strength of the heart, and the hope of glory. Conscious of his indwelling, he feels that he may do and speak the truth in the face of any opposition, and that success is as certain as the infinite resources of God can make it.

I sometimes hear a sermon that elicits in me such emotions as I have when gazing upon a beautiful picture, or a lovely landscape. Now and then I hear one that thrills me like an alarm bell. It takes me from a delusive dream, makes me feel the science ache, uncovers the poverty of my soul, and flashes upon me an awful sense of God, judgment and eternity. I sometimes hear a sermon that grates upon my sensibilities like a chime of cracked bells. Occasionally I hear one that is like a vision of heaven. I am so transported in thought and feeling that I can scarcely tell whether I am in the body or out of the body. I seem to walk the desert streets and hear the angels sing.

Why are the sermons of one man full of power, while those of another, of gifts and opportunities, are almost destitute of any quickening and transforming energy? It is because some ministers realize, not only that they are directly commissioned by the risen and glorified Christ, but that he is actually with them personally to guide and shield and support them, while other ministers perform their duties without any sense of divine authority and help.

Baptism of a Nun.

In a letter to the Baptist Mission Magazine, Rev. C. L. Davenport writes of the baptism of an interesting convert. He is laboring in Burmah, the land made known to the heart of all Christians by the name of the sainted Adoniram Judson. His station is at Sandoway, but he has a mission of the Arakan district, where his conversion occurred. He says: "One of those baptized was formerly a Buddhist nun. Her conversion is the first one of the kind in the district, and caused much excitement among the heathen and great joy among the Christians. All she knew of the Christian religion when she came was that Christ gave eternal life, and that was what her soul desired. Three patient teachings by Mah Lay, our Baptist Bible woman, brought her through, and she passed a searching examination before the committee, and again before the church. She married one of the Baptist preachers. We realize more and more that faithful work has been done throughout this region. The ingathering seems to be upon us. Villages hitherto hostile are sending down to us and asking for preachers and teachers. I have sent out men that our money will support, and there are calls to which I cannot resist."

Closing Days at our Children's Home.

The Work at Mont-Lawn

Ended for the Season.

LAST week witnessed the close of the third season of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. Our party of little mothers and babies, who took the children's places as our guests during the closing week, had a delightful time, the weather, fortunately, being fine. No one seemed to find greater enjoyment in the outing than poor Mary, the afflicted girl whose sad story was related in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD. But it was sad to witness the yearning expression on her childish face when some of the mothers visited by her and tell her of the beauties of the fields and woods of Mont-Lawn, and the glorious Hudson that flowed at the foot of the low range of hills, of the big round, the pretty chapel, and the attractions of which she seemed to try to form some mental picture of her home.

On Sept. 19, the last of our guests were glad and happily returned to New York, and the Home, with all its appointments and belongings in perfect order, was then left for the season. A peep into the cottages, with their white-draped cots, now full of life and chatter, now empty and silent; a look around the grounds, where by the barn, where no merry voices now awaken the echoes; down by the bathing-pool, where the boys were wont to splash and play like young dolphins; up in the orchard, where the last of the apples are ripening untouched; the swings hang idle, the big tent flaps empty, and even the birds have seemingly ceased their song because our children have gone. The House-mother, with a heart, looks over the place. The last of the season is shut, the wheels of the departing carriages roll smoothly over the walks, strewn with fallen leaves, and our Children's Home is once more left tenantless until the returning birds and flowers of another year shall welcome us back again.

Over 2208 children have been fed, clothed, and sheltered at the Home this season, making a total of 5544 children since the first opening three years ago. This year, owing to various necessary improvements (including the enlargement of our dormitory accommodations, and the construction of a reservoir, and pumping station to assure a sufficient water supply), the expenditures have been largely in excess of the contributions received. Doubtless, there are many of our readers, having such a work at heart, who would be pleased to aid in perpetuating the Home, but who, during the past season, may not have had an opportunity of finding in their mite to help the tenebrous children to an outing. We especially wish that as large a number of our readers as possible should be personally interested in this Christ-like mission among the children of the very poor, the orphans, and the neglected. All contributions for the Children's Home, however small, will be promptly acknowledged in these columns.

A Convert's Rich Reward.

A Christian Chinaman, named O-Hu, whose mother was baptized, was beaten and nearly drowned because he refused to perform ancestral worship. As soon as I heard of it, writes a missionary, I took Mr. Doherty and Messrs. Liu, Li, Du, native helpers and a colporteur, and went to his home. We called the head men of the village and had a talk with them. About one hundred people witnessed the outrage, and several of them helped to save the poor man's life. After a long talk we told the head men that if the four men would come to us and acknowledge their wrong, and pay the injured man an indemnity, we would agree to the matter being settled. They seem to think this fair and departed. The men came the next day, accompanied by the head men and several others. They confessed their wrong, and testified that O-Hu had done nothing amiss. We exhorted them to become such as he. They departed, after having agreed to do all we asked. They kept their word. Thus were O-Hu's sufferings richly rewarded.

The Invalid's Midday Song.

A WOMAN sitting near a window on one of the days of most intense heat, sang in sweet, clear notes:

Nearer, my God to thee,
E'en tho' it be a cross
That raiseth me!

A man in shabby workman's garb, as if spell-bound, stopped an instant, wiped the sweat of honest toil, mixed with the grime of hard labor, from his face, looked upward to the blue vault above, felt a hallowed thrill of hope and trust pass through his entire being, and his spirit raised above the toil and pain. He looked beyond his weariness and trial, knowing he was nearer to God for that song.

Another followed, one far on the downward road—one who once stood high among the upper class,—and heard what sounded like a wail of some spirit:

The sun gone down;
The sun gone down;
Darkness be over me.

Tears, the first that had dropped for years, trickled down his furrowed, fevered cheek, and a wild rush of passionate emotion, surged and resurged through his soul, while he quickly sought a hidden place, to pour out his penitence and remorse before God. A man of the world, wholly engrossed in its affairs, getting fast hardened under the cares and accumulation of wealth listened:

There let my way appear—
Steps unto Heaven;
Angels to beckon me.

Like the soft touch of an angel's wing, like a breath of melody from the clouds, fell those words on his ear. Memories of a mother's lullaby stole over him, and the solemn question, "Are my steps heavenward?" fastened on his upbraiding conscience, producing a new and a firm resolve to turn the steps from gross gold-seeking, to the city whose streets are paved with gold.

A beautiful woman in the full flush of her magical charms and power, decked in richest raiments of fashion, just risen from her couch of indolence and ease, and gone out to seek something to satisfy the insatiable longings of an immortal spirit and give zest to life, heard as in a dream:

Then with my waking thoughts,
Bright with thy praise;
Bethel I'll raise!

With every unstrung nerve quivering, with breath panting, with steps faltering, and a face all aglow, heart beating high, she retraced her steps and entered the luxurious room just vacated, tore off the gay insignia of "the world, the flesh, and the devil," and bowed and prayed as never before. Bowed in deep contrition; prayed in deepest conviction and penitence. Henceforth his praises, not her own, were to be the ruling passion of her consecrated life.

The same words as they fell in the noon-tide's torrid heat, echoed and re-echoed through a sad, lone, aching, bereft heart. One whose "stony griefs" had well-nigh driven her to despair. Then and there, quick as a lightning flash, the Angel of Peniel touched the spring of life within and faith, like a halo of glory, shone out and surrounded her pathway forevermore.

Next came a child of God, consecrated, following in his Master's steps. With no desire for any wide gate or broad way, he felt a sense of exultation overspread him, and his lips took up the song in glad refrain,

On joyful wing,
Cleaving the sky;
Sun, moon, and stars forgot,
Upward I fly.

The voices ceased and a restful, solemn hush fell upon the world around. It seemed as if a messenger from "the far-off shore" had been there and winged his way back to heaven. Oh! pale and suffering woman, sing thy songs with hope and faith; some weary wanderer may hear and turn homeward; some aching heart may be cheered and uplifted, some sinful soul give up its sins and find God.

The Gospel in the Army.

Evangelistic Work of the Chaplains, as Described by One of them.

IF there is one class of men, which, more than any other, needs the sustaining power of the Gospel as a guide and strengthener in every-day life, it is to be found in the Army and Navy. A few weeks ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published an article descriptive of the work of the naval chaplains. To-day, we give space to a communication from an Army Chaplain, Rev. T. G.

CHAPLAIN T. G. STEWARD

Steward, of Fort Messoula, Mont., who eloquently pleads the cause of the enlisted soldier. He writes:

"The Army of the United States consists of 25,000 enlisted men, and something over 2,000 officers. Counting with these, the families of the officers, and of the few married soldiers, and the necessary civil employees at the garrisons, the total population living at the military posts of the country cannot fall far below 30,000. To minister to these the government employs thirty-four chaplains, thirty of them designated as post-chaplains, and four regimental-chaplains. The chaplains are from all of the leading denominations, and each must be officially endorsed by his own church. They are not required to pass any professional examination upon entering the service, but must take the oath and pass a physical examination at the hands of the army surgeon. They are commissioned by the President and hold the rank of captain; and are subject to military rule as other officers, though seldom required to take any part in military ceremonies other than funerals.

"Their work is evangelical rather than pastoral. By law they are required to hold at least one service on the Sunday, and to supervise the schools at the posts where they are stationed. As a matter of fact, the present corps of chaplains consists of a fairly representative set of Gospel preachers, possessed of the usual degree of energy and zeal. Among them can be found the popular writer and platform orator, as Chaplain C. C. Bateman; the systematic and tireless worker, as Chaplain I. N. Rittner; the laborious author, as Chaplain O. J. Nave; and many others whose labors are recognized by all who know them. They are not permitted to do much reaping, but they keep on steadily sowing.

"Many a young man who hears God's call from the lips of the army chaplain, postpones his response until after he has left the army, and then gives it to the village or city pastor. Often, however, they do not forget to drop a line back to the frontier chaplain to cheer him to keep on sowing. I know of three young soldiers who have left the ranks to give their lives to Jesus in the sacred ministry.

"The army is so scattered that many go without religious attention. There are eighty-two posts and but thirty-four chaplains. Hence, more than half the posts must be without chaplains. The Christian sentiment of this country needs to be more thoroughly awakened as to the importance of having the army adequately supplied with chaplains; and the Christian churches could do more, it seems to me, to bring the chaplains and their work into the healthful glow of Christian fellowship. I think I speak for all the chaplains when I say to the churches: 'Brethren, we are not complaining, but we hunger and thirst to be remembered in your prayers.'"

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Russia's Peasant Homes.

Hard Life of the Poor—Women as Workers Indoors and in the Fields.

It would be difficult to find anywhere a more monotonous life than that of the peasantry of Russia. Both in city and country, the hours are long; indeed, it is a common thing for the workers in towns to begin at earliest daylight and to continue till long after dusk or until tired nature gives out and rest becomes imperative. In provincial towns workers can be seen fast asleep on the ground, after their hard day's toil. In the country, the farm laborers or the wood-choppers usually begin work at four o'clock in the morning, and their labor is only finished when the fading twilight, about 9 p.m., settles into the darkness of night. One would naturally suppose that to endure such protracted labor the workers would need an abundance of nourishing food; yet the usual fare of the Russian peasant is the simplest imaginable. There is a national proverb which says that coarse bread, tea, and cabbage-soup are the three best friends of the nation, and this probably still holds good in very many country districts; yet in spite of pinching poverty and wretched fare, the people have a hardy look and are capable of great endurance. They are patient and rarely murmur because life has brought to them few pleasures, but their simple homes are not altogether strangers to enjoyment.

As one travels through the country, especially the interior provinces, an opportunity is afforded of seeing something of the life of these people. Here and there are little villages, frequently built in a clear space, amid vast forests of fir and birch.

The huts of the peasants are generally rude dwellings of logs with board or thatch roof and probably only a single window. A patch of garden or a small field of grain marks the cultivator as a person of some means and ambition in the little community. Inside the huts, one is almost certain to find an icon or a picture of Russia's patron saint, Nicholas, with a tiny lamp burning before it. For the rest, there are a few roughly made pieces of furniture—strange contrast to the cosy pillows, blankets, feather beds, fur wraps, couches and shining samovars of the Muscovite homes of wealth.

But if the peasant be very poor, he is also very pious. On leaving his hut and also on entering it, he never fails to salute the icon or little framed image hung against the wall. He considers himself as being under its special protection and would never dream of omitting to remove his cap, when in its presence. And, if he lives near a city, he rarely fails on the recurrence of the sacred festivals to mingle among the vast audiences that fill the green-and-gold domed cathedral.

On the banks of the river Neva, near Schlüsselberg, are peasant villages, consisting of long lines of wooden cottages, weather-worn and guiltless of paint. The dwellers are agriculturists mainly, although some are engaged in lumbering in the extensive forests. Their wives—whose lot is probably even harder than that of the men—cook at home and, in the season, work afield as well. It is usually a coarse menu in these households: the inevitable cabbage soup (the national dish), sour black bread, badly-cooked vegetables, potatoes and turnips, and for accompaniment, either "vodka" or "kvass." The latter being a drink composed of barley-meal, salt and honey. Meat and butter are classed among the unattainables. Once in a long while there is a variation in this dull dietary routine, as at Easter, when every orthodox Russian housewife provides either "pasha" or "kushish," two odd but very popular dishes in which flour-cake, curds, plums and palm-twigs are leading ingredients.

Ignorance, superstition, and the reaction from many generations of priest-craft, have combined to unsettle the mind of the Russian peasantry on religion, and, as a consequence, they are split up into nearly two hundred sects, all differing more or less from the Greek church in matters of doctrine, and each worshipping according to its own peculiar lights. This religious dissension has spread greatly of late years, especially among the laboring classes, and is doubtless responsible for much of the unrest and unhappiness among the Czar's subjects. There are indications that the empire may yet pass through an experience, social and religious as well as political, in which the peasant will be a factor of no mean importance.

The Value of Little Things.

Children are more readily taught by anecdote and illustration than by theory. This beautiful incident, related by Rev. J. R. Miller in a recent address, teaches the value and importance of attention to little things: There was a great lighthouse out at sea. One night the men lighted the lamps, as usual. Some time afterward they saw that there appeared no light upon the water where ordinarily there was a bright line of beams. They examined their lamps—they were burning brightly. But they looked outside, and there were millions of little insects on the glass, so thickly piled there that the light could not get through. In the morning they learned that a ship had been wrecked close by because the light had been obscured by the insects. So the lamp may be burning brightly in your soul or in mine; but little faults—pride, ugly temper, selfishness, half-heartedness, bad habits of tongue, carelessness about paying debts or keeping promises, a hundred other things—may so cloud our lives as to obscure the image of God in our souls.

Tainted Associates.

Evil companionships constitute a grave danger in the path of the young. "I will not be satisfied," said a dissipated workman to a lad beside him, "till I make you just like myself—till you have seen it all and gone through what I have. Then you'll be a man!" This moral viper, himself a wreck, would have deliberately ruined the morals and health of the youth. He is a fair type of a class whose very touch is regarded by the moral and upright as contaminating, and it is well known that any intimate visible intercourse with such persons would be a forfeiture of their good names. But it is men of fair professions and unsuspected wickedness, and plausible yet insidious address, who are most to be feared as to their influence for evil. Describing this class, the Rev. J. R. Burgett writes: "Practiced in the arts of tempta-

Peace of Resignation.

WHEN adverse winds of fortune blow
And all life's efforts turn to woe
Then resignation brings sweet peace,
And all my earthly turmoils cease.
When friends prove false and love seems vain
When on dark waves of sorrow tossed
Then resignation, soulful trust,
Proclaims the truth, "That God is just."
When hope seems crushed by darkening fate,
And wailing cries, too late, too late,
Then resignation, calm and still,
Restores my soul to God's own will.
When death comes thief-like in the night
And earth shall fade from mortal sight
Then resignation's sheltering arms
I'll seek, and flee from life's alarms.
Then whatso'er on earth my fate,
I'll murmur not, but calmly wait,
Though life may lose its precious charm
There's strength in resignation's arm.
How soft and sweet its magic spell,
It chants the song, "that all is well,"
What peace in resignation's arms,
All fears and terrors it disarms.

Home Religion.

RELIGION in the family or family religion is a safeguard for all the members. Says a pastor in The Reformed Evangelist. Parents who are earnest for the spiritual and temporal welfare of their children, will strive to secure for them the best conditions for happiness and peace. Religious habit and expression, devout manner and pious example, from parents in the home, go far to mold the child's life. Parents who do not live religion as an ideal and principle are not able to attract their children by a mechanical or didactic imitation of its gracious power. If they ever talk of religion to their families, it is like the true fire. Seldom is it possible to enforce a mere theory without a living example to illustrate the truth. So it happens that very little account is made of it in the family intercourse. Parental love would do much for the religious life of the child if it only entered into the true spirit.

From whatever cause, it is lamentably sure that piety is not cultivated; it should be by precept and example in Christian families. Few parents use the privilege of enforcing religious exhortations. They do not make themselves acquainted with the spiritual state of their children. About school or home duties, or business employment, they take occasion to converse in relation to the young. But spiritual matters are left in the background, and neglected family worship and parental converse with the members of the family. The parents are ashamed to begin and thus to confess their fault. They do not even ever pray with the child in public or in family assembly, either morning or evening. They do not ask a blessing at their tables. They do not teach their children the catechism, nor expect them to "learn by heart" its answers. No one is made to awaken a sense of baptismal obligations, or to call forth to activity the covenant grace. No wonder children brought up in such circumstances evince small inclination or tendency to spiritual growth.

Longfellow and the Children.

The great American poet was especially fond of children, and in his writings as well as in his domestic life, gave many evidences of the fact. Readers will remember many of his poems that show his love for the little ones and the delight he took in joining in their pleasures. He wrote, on the occasion of his study being invaded by a merry childish band:

Do you think, O blue-eyed banditti,
Because you have sealed the wall,
Such an old moustache as I am
Is not a match for you all?

An anecdote is related which shows his love for the children: It seems that the little fellow was fond of spending his time in the great poet's library. One day, after a long and patient perusal of the titles of his great cumbersome works, that he found on the shelves, the little lad walked up to Longfellow, and asked in a pouting way: "Haven't you got a 'Jack the Giant Killer'?" Longfellow regretted to find that in all his immense library he did not have a copy. The little one looked at him in a pitying way and silently left the room. The next morning he walked in with a couple of pennies tightly clasped in his chubby fist, and laying them down, told the poet that he could now buy "Jack the Giant Killer" of his own.

God or Mammon.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning October 11. Matt. 6: 19-24.

MAMMON signifies, in its strict etymological meaning, something in which trust placed. So far as we know, there never was an idol of that name, like Baal or Moloch. But the word in Christ's time came to be significant of riches. People tested in them, made them the supreme object of concern and were willing to sacrifice anything to get them. So riches practically became a god, whom the people served. A man may easily enter such service now, and he could in Christ's day. Realizing how much a competence can do to promote happiness, he may in the beginning seek money from the most laudable motives. He has seen a widow struggling for bread for herself and fatherless children. He has seen the insulted, threatened, harassed and oppressed. As he looked at his own beloved and little ones, and realized the uncertainty of his own life, he has resolved to labor and strive to save them from a fate. There is nothing leading in this. It is natural affection and a very proper and praiseworthy aim. The man curtails his pleasures, takes care of little sums, practices small economies, that he may raise a barrier between himself and the wolf of poverty. By and bye the habit of getting and saving becomes almost a slavery. Everything goes away to it. The man begins to give to charity, he desires to help a brother in adversity, he neglects his religious duties that he may have time to get money. Now Christ's warning begins to appear to him. He is enlisted in a service which is not God's. He shows a divided allegiance. He will he act, if a dilemma confronts him, in which he must be faithful to God and lose money, or be unfaithful to God and gain money? By telling a lie, by misrepresenting the quality of his goods, he can make a large sum. By telling the exact truth he may lose the opportunity of a sale and the goods may remain on his hands until they become unsalable. How will he act? He craves for money is singing upon him, he will tell a lie and save himself from poverty. Then he is serving Mammon. His money is a rival to God, and he serves it instead of God. That is where the trouble comes in. Christ has no quarrel with wealth or its possessors; but he has irreconcilable hostility to the service of mammon. He declares that the service of mammon and of God are incompatible. A man may possess money when he is true to Christ, or he may be untrue to Christ, but Christ takes no account of it. It is the man himself, soul and body, that he wants, not money. He is no better for having it, nor worse for being without it. But if the man is giving part of his heart to his money, if he has limitations, so that there are things he could not give up for Christ's sake, if occasion arose, then Christ has no use for him. When the rich young man came to Christ he was required to give up wealth away; but the apostle John was not required to give up the house he owned in Jerusalem. The difference was due to the fact that the young man was testing in his riches making mammon of himself, while John loved his Master with all his heart. Christ requires the whole heart of every man whom he accepts as a disciple and will not share it with riches or any other rival.

THE GLORIOUS CHURCH.

Suggested by Carrie E. Brech. The Christian Herald, Aug. 5
 THE Church of God, one blessed psalm,
 One vast hosanna to our Lord;
 A voice of praise unto our King,
 For blessings from his precious Word.
 Joy drops from the baptismal font,
 As all to him is gladly given;
 Joy spreads the sacramental feast,
 That weds us to our Lord in Heaven.
 Joy warbles in the anthem sweet,
 In sacred chimes so grand and long;
 Joy beats against the gate of Heaven,
 A hallelujah burst of song.
 For situation beautiful,
 Mount Zion, joy of all the earth,
 The Church where Jesus meets his own,
 And rays his light and beauty forth.
 O, joy of meeting here on earth
 With those who serve and love our King,

All in him Christ, our heaven begun,
 To him our glad thank-offerings bring.

THE SEASONS.

SO soberly and softly
 The seasons tread their round,
 So surely seeds of autumn
 In spring-time clothe the ground,
 Amid their measured music
 What watchful ear can hear
 God's voice amidst the garden?
 Yet, hush! for He is here!
 No mere machine is nature.
 Wound up and left to play,
 No wind-harp swept at random
 By airs that idly stray
 A spirit sways the music,
 A hand is on the chords.
 Oh, bow thy head and listen,—
 That hand, it is the Lord's!

The Prophetic Parables.

The Period Prefigured by the Parable of the Treasure Hid in the Field.
 BY GEO. H. PEMBER, M.A.

THERE is now a pause in our Lord's discourse, and the remaining Parables are spoken to the disciples alone. Some turning-point is indicated, and possibly a more confined area, as though the action of this scene would, in the main, be restricted to a few favored countries of Christendom. And so we seem to recognize the results brought about by the Reformation. The ceaseless working and rapid progress of the heaven is checked; but that is all: the heaven is not itself purged away. Only that which has been active for evil now settles down into a cold inert mass; so that the outward appearance of the nominal Church is that of a field. Nevertheless, hidden beneath its unpromising surface lies the heavenly treasure. The description is wonderfully true when applied to the times of Protestant deadness which, following the Reformation, lasted on with but few signs of life to vary their monotony until it was broken by the preaching of Wesley, Whitefield, and others. For after the enthusiasm of the conflict with Rome had passed away, men settled down to a mere form of godliness, while they denied its power. They thought it a duty to go through their heartless services, but love had grown cold: they boasted of their pure faith, but failed to show the works which it should have produced. And a mournful proof of this may be found in the fact that two centuries had elapsed before they aroused themselves to any general missionary effort. Soon the peoples of Christendom among whom the Reformation had triumphed were divided off into sharp-defined sects, like fenced birds. Each of these sects held the life-giving doctrine of the atonement; but it was often concealed more or less by other teachings, which in some cases seemed to have been very imperfectly purged from the heaven. During this period the number of believers was usually increased in the manner indicated by the Parable. A man would, as it were by chance, hear of the Gospel of Christ, and, having received it, would in his joy buy the whole field, that is, accept, at any cost to himself, all the doctrines of the community of Christians in which he had found his treasure. This was a very characteristic feature of the times from the Reformation to the middle of the present century: the generality of good men, after finding the heavenly treasure in some professing body, while holding firmly, indeed, to fundamental and vital truths, would in other matters thenceforth read the word of God, not independently, but by the light of, and to prove the correctness of, the doctrines which they had adopted. And the various Protestant Churches, while conceding salvation to all believers in Christ's atonement were wont, nevertheless, to preserve strongly-marked lines of separation, and to give undue prominence to their distinctive tenets. The time described under the figure of the treasure hid in the field was that of the first gray dawn of revival. Men were finding a power in religion the existence of which they had not suspected. It was something they could use and they knew its value. By and bye there were to come seekers, but this discovery was accidental.

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

At the Cletheroe's.

A BETTER husband never lived," said Mrs. Cletheroe to her daughter, "but your father does not comprehend that a woman can have any need of money."

"Well," said Elizabeth Cletheroe, "I am going to talk against my own father, but you must own, dear, that he is as clear as the bark of a tree. I would sometimes rather do without a few of his virtues, in exchange for a wee mite of generosity."

"Hush, Libby," said the mother, warningly. "There are worse men than your father."

"And very few harder to live with," said Elizabeth, "How much money has he given you in the last year?"

"I've had my egg money," said Mrs. Cletheroe.

"That is not the question I asked. Where, has father given you for your own spending, ten dollars in the last twelve months?"

"No," said the mother, "But then he spends very little on himself."

"That again is not the question. Papa has not many personal wants. But he is bidding an addition to the barn, which could have been done without, he gets the new tools he wants, and hires as much help as he cares for, and he has the money in his pocket, to keep or to spend, or to save as he likes, while you never have a penny to call your own, though you certainly are a partner in the firm, and help him in making a livelihood. I say it isn't fair."

"Well, Libby," said the patient mother, sighing, "don't work yourself up into a state about it. When you are as old as I am, you will have learned that a fuss is not worth one's while. Now, the present dress with me is, how to get a couple of dollars to send as my subscription to Armenia. Those suffering Christians are always before my eyes. There is nothing that I can do without, and no way that I can earn anything. Father would let me go out sewing or washing if I had the time. And there's no use in asking him for the money. I never ask him for a penny if I can do without, for though he gives it, he always does it reluctantly, and there is no peace in the house that day."

"Yet," said Elizabeth, "you call my father a good husband! Before I marry Jim Pettigrew, he and I will come to a clear understanding about the finances! But you may be sure of! You can't get ten dollars for the Armenian subscription, can you, my father the richest farmer in the county, with money in the bank, and always a roll of bills in his pocket? I'd bet he when he was asleep!"

"Mrs. Cletheroe's delicate old face flushed noticeably."

"Elizabeth," she said, "never suggest such a thing again. I am vexed that such an expedient should so much as enter your head. I'll tell you what I mean to do. I am going to sell Grandmother Fyler's blue China bowl."

"Oh! mother; not the rose-bowl?"

"Yes, dear, the rose-bowl. Mrs. Karl Anna, the bride at the inn, saw it when she stopped here to rest the other day, and," Mrs. Cletheroe paused, and caught her breath, "she offered me twenty dollars for it. I have never had twenty dollars at once in my hand since I was a bride; since before that, indeed, when I taught the district school at the Centre, before I met Sam Cletheroe."

"Mother, I hate to let you sell the bowl; it is our heirloom."

"And I hate to sell it, my dear, but when I consider what twenty dollars means, what freedom from worry, what chance to buy whatever I want—new gown, new ribbon, a religious paper and the wonderful premiums that come with it for another year—the means of putting a little into this charity and a little into that, perhaps of taking a trip across country to see my sister, I cannot resist the temptation. The bowl is dear to me, and I will grieve when it is gone, but I think about that twenty dollars and its possibilities till I am fairly wild. It is dreadful to be a pauper, Libbie, doubly dreadful when you are a rich man's wife. But your father is a good man, dear. He does not even dream of the way I want a little bit of money of my own. And nothing can open his eyes."

Elizabeth gave in at last. She went to the darkened parlor, and brought out the big, beautiful bowl. A wonder of a thing in the rare, blue delf-ware which everybody in these days prizes. She, too, felt that twenty dollars was the gate to much delight, that her mother had right to spend her substance, including the sale of an ancestral bowl, if she chose.

But the conversation, from first to last, had, quite unsuspected by the women, had a very uncomfortable listener of one. Mr. Cletheroe, contrary to his custom, had gone to his own room at an hour when he her China to get a paltry sum of money. Why didn't she ask for it outright?

Why, indeed? Memory brought up the last time she had done so, and his own words:

"Of all the wasteful, improvident, utterly irresponsible women, Mary, you are the worst. You cannot keep a cent in your pocket. If it were not for me, we would go to the poor-house. No madam, I haven't five dollars for you to-day, not five cents!"

He remembered it, the pitiful, shameful scene, and his wife's grieved look. She had not asked him for any money since. No wonder!

"And I call myself a gentleman, and a Christian!" he murmured. "The Lord forgive me!"

The ladies went upstairs fortunately, in time to let the prisoner escape unseen. And the blue rose-bowl was not sold, after all. For Silas experienced a change of heart.

Missionary Fenwick Tells of the Cheering Gospel Progress in that Far-off Land.—New Mission Buildings.

FROM Rev. Malcolm C. Fenwick, missionary at Wonsan, Corea, we have received the following interesting letter, relating the progress of the work under his charge:

In my last letter I made mention of some heathen funerals I had witnessed. I wish to tell you now of a Christian funeral in Corea, having just returned from one.

MISSIONARY FENWICK'S NEW $50 MISSION HOUSE, KOREA.

was usually afield. The morning had been close, and he was weary, and the chamber was cool and restful. He sat down in his wife's Boston rocker, and fell asleep. From a short and blissful nap, he was awakened by hearing the indignant voice of his daughter declaring him to be as close as the bark of a tree. He listened, fascinated, hot and cold by turns, and certainly in his case, the old proverb, "Listeners never hear any good of themselves," was near to being verified.

Now, Mr. Cletheroe was, according to his illumination, a just man, and he was also fond of his wife and proud of his daughter Elizabeth. In common parlance Silas Cletheroe was what is known as a good provider. There was plenty to eat beneath his roof, and the house was substantial and amply furnished. Coal and wood were laid in ungrudgingly in the winter season, and repairs were made whenever they were needed. Mr. Cletheroe was but one of a thousand men who look on women simply as grown-up children, and to whom it never occurs that their wives may inwardly chafe against being in the position of respectable mendicants.

As he sat there, fearing that Mrs. Cletheroe or Libby would have an errand into the room and discover him there, he grew more and more wretched. It is not often that we hear precisely what our dear ones think of us with entire candor, and Mr. Cletheroe saw himself in the mirror of unsparring domestic criticism for the first time in his life.

"Sell her blue bowl!" He almost jumped from his chair. His wife disposing of

No noise, no heathen singing, no emblems of demon worship characterized it, but a plain bier, carried quietly to a high hill behind the town, and accompanied by two score or more believers. It was my privilege to preach there this morning. In front of me, with his face bowed to the earth, knelt the eldest son of the deceased mother, a faithful witness of Jesus' power to save. When I had done speaking and extended to him sympathy, his only reply was, "I have no sorrow."

We have been building a native guest-room to live in, and hold preaching services, and I am glad to be able to send you a photograph of it with this letter. It cost only between $50 and $60, and I think it a model bachelor missionaries' house for Corea. My last mail from America brought me the cheering news that three missionaries and their wives were ready to join me and spread the joyful message throughout the benighted land.

This means that I must hurry along the construction of a reception home for them. According to the plan it will contain six bedrooms, a dining-room and a kitchen. Like the reception room for natives, it will be built in the native style throughout and probably cost $250. The furnishings will be extra—a folding-bed, a couple of chairs and matting will have to be purchased for each room. We hope to make dresser, washstands, writing-tables, etc., out of packing-cases and gauze curtains. We believe the life of faith is an economical one, and the money should be cared for much more carefully than our private purse. We shall need a duplicate of the reception room now completed, for lady workers on the other corner of the lot, and we will then be able to live and work according to Corean Custom.

Now is the church's time to evangelize not only this province, but the whole of Corea. I am persuaded it is God's will to have Corea evangelized at once. May the blessed Spirit constrain many who read these lines to pray without ceasing to bring about such a consummation.

We have every reason to rejoice and praise God for the thoroughness of the little flock here. They are already giving of their substance unto the Lord, and hope to support a worker in China. The church here, in her infant innocence, is ready to do all these things unto the Lord. May she ever remain so. Yours in Christ,

MALCOLM C. FENWICK.

The Great Eclipse of 1898.

EIGHTEEN months hence, in January, 1898, India will be visited by scientists and savants of every nation, to view the extraordinary eclipse of the sun which takes place on January 21 of that year. It will be visible in totality in India alone. It will commence in Central Asia at sunrise, the first contact of the two discs being in longitude 18 degrees E., and almost on the equator. The central line of the moon's shadow will then cross the Indian Ocean, enter India on the Bombay coast at Ratnagiri, move thence in a northeasterly direction, and finally vanish in Kamchatka. The zone of totality will be fifty miles broad, and at all places within this belt the sun will appear wholly eclipsed by the moon. At many places in India and on Mt. Everest the total eclipse will be visible, and the darkness of night will appear at mid-day. At certain other places the eclipse will appear almost total, but a thin crescent of one limb of the sun will be seen. The eclipse will be partially visible at every part of Asia from Spitzbergen to Sumatra.

The period of actual totality and absolute darkness lessens as the eclipse proceeds; at Ratnagiri the sun will remain wholly concealed for two minutes and eleven and one-half seconds; at Nagpore totality will last for one minute and fifty-five seconds, and the snow-capped peak of Mt. Everest will be enveloped in darkness for one and one-half minutes. These short periods are the durations of absolute totality, but the actual eclipse will be visible during its different stages of progression for some three hours at every place. At Nagpore, for instance, the moon will first begin to interpose itself at 12-8, Madras time, just after mid-day, but it will not have wholly shut out the sun's rays till half-past one in the afternoon; absolute darkness will then last for nearly two minutes, the stars will be seen, the birds will go to roost, the flowers will close, there will be a sudden and considerable fall in the temperature, and then the moon will slowly uncover the sun, the last contact of their two discs occurring at 2:56 p.m., or nearly three hours after the first contact.

The Wonderful Star, Algol.

Astronomers the world over are still interested in that most wonderful star, Algol, which has probably been the subject of more observations than any other star in the heavens in two centuries. Spectroscopic observations now show that the well-known variations in the light of this star are caused by the intervention of a dark body between our system and the star. Before a minimum, it is found to be moving away from our system wholly independent of a continuous translation toward us, at the rate of over three miles a second, and, immediately after a minimum, approaches us with equal speed. By the aid of spectroscopy and photography, Dr. Vogel, of Potsdam, Germany, has lately determined the following most interesting elements of the system of Algol: Diameter of Algol, 1,600,000 miles; diameter of dark body, 800,030; distance from centre to centre, 3,230,000 miles; orbit velocity of Algol, 26,000 miles per second.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

The Henderson-Ames Company, Kalamazoo, Mich.

unning the Gauntlet.

The Professor arose to dismiss the pupils when one of the leaders jumped up, on behalf of the pupils of the school, thanked Director Plummer for his kind and considerate address. Another boy stepped out in a strong voice: "Three cheers for Mr. Plummer!" Three rousing, yell cheers, that shook the walls of the building, went up for Director Plummer, the man who worked the boys out of the best "scrape" they had ever seen at Brookdale Academy.

"Bang, bang," went the gong, quiet was restored, all the scholars were dismissed in order, and they were the happiest of fellows on the Atlantic slope. Although but twenty boys were directly invited and open to punishment, still the programme was that as most of them knew of the contemplated movement and intended to drop in to see Fitzroy before he was ungagged and released, nearly the whole school was in sympathy with the act.

The evening a mass meeting of the pupils was held and a collection taken, to be applied: first, to the purchase of grapes and delicacies for Green; and second, to hire a village brass band for a serenade to Mr. Plummer.

Mr. Seymour, who, with other parents and students, had come to witness the navigation, walked up to Deacon Walcott, and was in earnest conversation with him about her son, when Mr. Plummer approached, and interrupting them, said: "Ask your pardon, deacon: hope you don't take offence." Then turning to Mr. Seymour, he continued: "Madam, relation of yours is not so bad a fellow as he looks, and you must convince the deacon of the fact," and off went Mr. Plummer with a bound.

The deacon was nervous, and evidently tried to end the interview with the mother, while she endeavored to exonerate her son from complicity in the hazing affair. The father of Carrie, and mother of Alice parted, however, after a long talk, with more friends than when they met.

An hour later, Mrs. Seymour and her son were on their way home from the Academy. The mother was low spirited and nervous, and Milton, with some reason, of self-satisfaction, if not vanity, at the flattering speech of Mr. Plummer, still proud but little of his usual animation. He is getting older rapidly, and forgetting the things that were behind, he thought of, and looked only to those ahead. He was growing out of boyhood into manhood, and was dissatisfied with his past record, and present position of attainment, having no definite plans for the future.

"Milton," spoke the mother, breaking a long silence, "to-day's proceedings show that we have enemies in Brookdale, as well as friends, and I must enjoin upon you great discretion."

A neighbor was waiting for their arrival when brought in the last issue of the County Record, a small sheet published in the next town. The item which attracted attention was the following:

"School frolic and sad denouement. At Brookdale Academy, on last Monday night occurred a circumstance not soon to be forgotten in this neighborhood. A new pupil having recently been admitted, named Fitzroy, the boys, headed by a notorious character named Seymour, who is said to be remost in every mischief, attacked Fitzroy while in bed, intending to bind him and dip him in the neighboring mill pond. His friends, however, showed up pistols and knives were freely used, several were wounded, and one of them, named Green, it is feared, was fatally injured. The trustees will offer a reward of one hundred dollars for Seymour's arrest and conviction."

Fin real or imaginary causes, Mrs. Seymour's nerves had already been worked up to a high pitch of excitement, and this last newspaper item nearly prostrated her, although apparently a mass of absurdities. In vain did Milton laugh at it, and tell her that it was the stupid blunder of a country editor; she would not be comforted, and retired to her room.

Shall we follow her there and pry into family secrets? Something unusual had taken possession of her mind. Perhaps it was only a woman's fancy; perhaps a woman's instinct and perception were at the bottom. Something, besides Milton's past life, and future prospects, was worrying the Widow Seymour. While her son was reading God's Word, and meditating upon the events of the day, the mother was asking her Heavenly Father for light, strength and grace, and seeking wisdom and guidance until—

Heaven came down, her soul's great light, while glory shrouded the mortal sight.

Milton, left to himself, with no lessons to study, no mother to converse with, and a dread, undefined something depressing his spirits, was in a forlorn condition; on the very day people would have thought he was as happy as a king. His mother's depression seemed to have been contagious.

TIME TELLS THE STORY.

SINGER SEWING MACHINES do Good Work DURING A LIFETIME.

There is a big difference between the cost of making a first-class sewing machine, embodying the best of materials and workmanship, and one made in the cheapest manner. The buyer of the cheap machine soon pays the difference of price in the constant cost for repairs, to say nothing of its annoying inefficiency.

Results Make Reputation.

Singer Machines, either lock-stitch or chain-stitch, are the successful result of long experience and constant improvements in the endeavor to make nothing but the best sewing machines for family use. The accomplishment of this result requires six of the largest, best-equipped factories in the world, the best inventive talent of the age, and the constant employment of twelve thousand workmen. Singer Machines are sold only by our employees, and not through dealers or department stores.

The Value of Reputation.

A reputation based on half a century's experience, dealing directly with the women of the family all over the world, is unique, and stimulates a worthy pride. THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY aims to maintain its well-earned reputation for fair dealing during all time. It is permanent, its offices are in every city in the world, and parts and supplies for its machines can always be easily obtained.

This Beautiful Tea Set Yours

Here is a photo-reduction of four of the daintiest, hand engraved pieces, Tea Pot, Sugar-bowl, Creamer and Spooner. Each is a gem of the silversmith's art. Every piece triple plated on hard white metal, hand engraved—durable, serviceable and valuable. Each piece stamped "Leonard Mfg. Co., Triple Plate a Warranted Ten Years." Not miniature pieces but large, full size, for every day use. Nothing can be more fascinating than this captivating tea set. The tea pot full size, hinged cover surmounted with a richly hand engraved ornamental piece charming in pattern and exquisite in effect. The sugar-bowl has detachable cover, is symmetrical in proportion and just as dainty a piece of art as the finest taste could desire. The spooner and creamer are both gold-lined and marvels of matchless workmanship and delicacy of hand engraving, and the four pieces combine to make a set which no ordinary description can possibly do justice to. Send us a check or order for twelve sets of our famous World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons with fifteen dollars (cash with order) and we will send free (express and all other charges prepaid), this grand Tea Set and 12 sets of Souvenir Teaspoons delivered anywhere in the United States. Never before has a house of A-1 standing made such liberal offer as this, and if when you receive the goods you are not pleased and fully believe this the greatest bargain ever offered, send them back, and your money will be returned to you at once without any expense to you. Is not this a fair proposition? Could any offer be more in good faith? But you will want to keep it. It is impossible to be disappointed. The thousands of people all over the land who have shown our famous souvenir spoons to friends, relatives and neighbors and secured our other wonderful premiums, know that any offer we make is genuine, worth several times more than we ask and a chance that no one can afford to miss.

The World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons have been advertised so widely during the last two years that they are well known throughout the land. A set is composed of 6 full size Teaspoons, heavy triple-plated on white metal, with the bowls gold-plated both inside and outside. They are not the common washed-over spoons but are stamped "Leonard Mfg. Co., A-1," which is a guarantee of reliability and square dealing. Each bowl contains a different building. There are 12 different buildings, as follows:

Set No. 1 comprises the Manufacturers, Horticultural, Woman's, Fisheries, Machinery and Transportation buildings. Set 3 includes the Administration, Agricultural, Electrical, Mining and Government buildings.

Be sure to specify in your order how many sets of each kind you desire. Sets will not be broken, so do not ask it.

The price at which we sell these spoons (6 for 99c.) is so remarkably low that every housekeeper can afford to have a set. Remember these spoons are not Orange Spoons, nor "After Dinner" Coffee Spoons, but are regular, full size teaspoons.

If you have never seen these spoons before, send us 99c. for a single set, and when you receive them you will have no trouble in inducing your friends to give you their order. Remember the Tea Set is entirely free with every $15.00 order you send us.

This is your opportunity to get a tea set at a price that outbargains any bargain you ever heard of. The 12 sets of Souvenir Teaspoons alone are cheap at $15.00 and you thus get the beautiful tea set practically free. The entire tea set and the 12 sets (72 spoons in all) of the famous World's Fair Souvenir Tea Spoons will be sent prepaid by express on receipt of $15.00 by P. O. or Express Money Order. Personal checks not accepted. Send in your order to-day, and always remember that we refund the money in every instance where the goods are not exactly as represented. Address all orders to Divine Chirography.

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., } "Rejoice because your names are written in on the Text: Luke 10: 20. heaven."

CHIROGRAPHY, or the art of handwriting, like the science of acoustics, is in very unsatisfactory state. While constructing a church, and told by some architects that the voice would not be heard in a building shaped like that proposed, I came in much anxiety to this city and consulted with Professor Joseph Henry, of the Smithsonian Institution, about the law of acoustics. He said: "Go ahead and build your church in the shape proposed, and I think it will be all right. I have studied the laws of sound perhaps more than any man of my time, and I have come so far as this: Two auditoriums may seem to be exactly alike, and in one the acoustics may be good and in the other bad." In the same unsatisfactory stage is chirography, although many declare they have reduced it to a science. There are those who say they can read character by handwriting. It is said that the way one writes the letter "I" decides his egotism or modesty, and the way one writes the letter "O" decides the height and depth of his emotions. It is declared a cramped hand means a cramped nature, and an easy, flowing hand a facile and liberal spirit; but if there be anything in this science, there must be some rules not yet announced, for some of the boldest and most aggressive men have a delicate and small penmanship, while some of the most timid sign their names with the height and width and scope of the name of John Hancock on the immortal document. Some of the cleanest in person and thought present their blotted and spattered page, and some of the roughest put before us an immaculate chirography. Not our character, but the copy-plate set before us in our school-boy day, decides the general style of our handwriting. So also there is a fashion in penmanship, and for one decade the letters are exaggerated, and in the next minified: now erect and now aslant, now heavy and now fine. An autograph album is always a surprise, and you find the penmanship contradicts the character of the writers. But while the chirography of the earth is uncertain, our blessed Lord in our text presents the chirography celestial. When addressing the seventy disciples standing before him, he said: "Rejoice because your names are written in heaven."

Of course the Bible, for the most part, when speaking of the heavenly world, speaks figuratively while talking about book and about trumpets and about wings and about gates and about golden pavements and about orchards with twelve crops of fruit—one crop each month—and about the white horses of heaven's cavalry; but we do well to follow out these inspired metaphors and reap from them courage and sublime expectation, and consolation and victory. We are told that in the heavenly library there is a Book of Life. Perhaps there are many volumes in it. When we say a book, we mean all written by the author on that subject. I cannot tell how large those heavenly volumes are, nor the splendor of their binding, nor the number of their pages, nor whether they are pictorialized with some exciting scenes of this world. I only know that the words have not been impressed by type, but written out by some hand, and that the seventy disciples to whom the text was spoken, repent and trust the Lord for their eternal salvation, surely have their names written in heaven. It may not be the same name that we carried on earth. We may, through the inconsiderateness of parents, have a name that is uncouth, or that was afterward dishonored by one after whom we were called. I do not know that the seventy entrances of the names of the seventy disciples correspond with the record in the genealogical table. It may not be the name by which we were called on earth, but it will be the name by which heaven will know us, and we will have it announced to us as we pass in, and we will know it so certainly that we will not have to be called twice by it, as in the Bible times the Lord called some people twice by name, "Saul! Saul!" "Samuel! Samuel!" "Martha! Martha!"

When you come up and look for your name in the mighty tomes of eternity and you are so happy as to find it there, you will notice that the penmanship is Christ's, and that the letters were written with a trembling hand. Not trembling with old age, for he had only passed three decades when he expired. It was soon after the thirtieth anniversary of his birthday. Look over all the business accounts you kept or the letters you wrote at thirty years of age, and if you were ordinarily strong and well, then there was no tremor in the chirography. Why the tremor in the hand that wrote your name in heaven? Oh, it was a compression of more troubles than ever smote anyone else, and all of them troubles assumed for others. Christ was prematurely old. He had been exposed to all the weathers of Palestine. He had slept out of doors, now in the night dew and now in the tempest. He had been soaked in the surf of Lake Galilee. Pillows for others, but he had not where to lay his head. Hungry, he could not even get a fig on which to breakfast; or have you missed the pathos of that verse, "In the morning, as he returned unto the city, he hungered, and when he saw a fig tree in the way, he came to it and found nothing thereon." Oh, he was a hungry Christ, and nothing makes the hand tremble worse than hunger, for it pulls upon the stomach, and the stomach pulls upon the brain, and the brain pulls upon the nerves, and the agitated nerves make the hand quake. On the top of all this exasperation came abuse. What sober man ever wanted to be called a drunkard? but Christ was called one. What respecter of the Lord's Day wants to be called a Sabbath-breaker? but he was called one. What man, careful of the company he keeps, wants to be called the associate of profligates? but he was so called. What loyal man wants to be charged with treason? but he was charged with it. What man of devout speech wants to be called a blasphemer? but he was so termed. What man of self-respect wants to be struck in the mouth? but that is where they struck him. Or to be the victim of vilest expectation? but under that he stooped. Oh, he was a worn-out Christ. That is the reason he died so soon upon the cross. Many victims of crucifixion lived day after day upon the cross; but Christ was in the court-room at 12 o'clock of noon and he had expired at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day. Subtracting from the three hours between 12 and 3 o'clock the time taken to travel from the court-room to the place of execution and the time that must have been taken in getting ready for the tragedy, there could not have been much more than two hours left. Why did Christ live only two hours upon the cross, when others had lived forty-eight hours? Ah! he was worn out before he got there, and you wonder, oh, child of God, that, looking into the volumes of heaven for your name, you find it was written with a trembling penmanship,—trembling with every letter of your name, if it be your earthly name, or trembling with every letter of your heavenly name, if that be different and more euphonious. That will not be the first time you saw the mark of a quivering pen, for did you not, oh, man, years ago see your name so written on the back of a letter, and you opened it, saying, "Why, here is a letter from mother," or "Here is a letter from father," and after you opened it you found all the words because of old age were traced irregularly and uncertain, so that you could hardly read it at all. But after much study you made it out,—a letter from home, telling you how much they missed you, and how much they prayed for you, and how much they wanted to see you, and if it might not be on earth that so it might be in the world where there are no partings. Yes, your name is written in heaven, if written at all, with trembling chirography.

Again, in examination of your name in the heavenly archives, if you find it there at all, you will find it written with a bold hand. You have seen many a signature that because of sickness or old age had a tremor in it, yet it was as bold as the man who wrote it. Many an order written on the battlefield and amid the thunder of the cannonade, has had evidence of excitement in every word and every letter and in the speed with which it was folded and handed to the officer as he put his foot in the swift stirrups, and yet that commander, notwithstanding his trembling hand, gives a boldness of order that shows itself in every word written. You do not need to be told that a trembling hand does not always mean a cowardly hand. It was with a very trembling hand Charles Carroll of Carrollton signed his name to the Declaration of American Independence, but no signer had more courage and when someone said, "There are many Charles Carrolls, and it will not be known which one it is," he resumed the pen and wrote Charles Carroll of Carrollton. Trembling hand no sign of timidity. The daring and defiance seen in the way your name is written in heaven is a challenge to all earth and hell to come on if they can to defeat your ransomed soul. The way your name is written there is as much as to say, "I have redeemed him; I died for him; I am going to crown and enthrone him. Nothing shall ever happen, down in that world where he now lives, to defeat my determination to keep him, to shelter him, to save him. By my Almighty grace I am going to fetch him here. He may slip and slide, but he has got to come here. By my omnipotent sword, by the combined strength of all heaven's principalities and powers and dominions, by the twenty thousand chariots of the Lord Almighty, I am going to see him through." Bold handwriting! It is the boldest thing ever written to write my name there and your name there. He knows our weaknesses and bad propensities better than we know them ourselves. He knows all the apollyonic hosts that are sworn to down us if they can. He knows all the temptations that will assail us between now and the moment of our last pulsation of the heart, and yet he dares to write our name there. Boldness! Nothing at Saragossa, or Chalons, or Marathon, or Thermopylae to equal it! Nothing in the sack of gun-powder which one English soldier carried under the blazing artillery of the Mohammedans and blew up the gate of Delhi! Can you not see the boldness in the penmanship that has already written our names there? Apostle Peter, what do you think of it? And he answers, "Kept by the power of God through faith unto complete salvation." Oh, blessed Christ, what dost thou mean by it? And he answers, "I shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." "Your names are written in heaven."

Again, if according to the promise of text you are permitted to look into the volumes of eternity and shall see your name there, you will find it written in lines, in words, in letters unmistakable. Some people have come to consider it distinct and almost unreadable penmanship mark of genius, and so they affect it, because every paragraph that Thomas Cammers, and Dean Stanley, and Lord Byron and Rufus Choate, and other potent writers wrote was a puzzle, imitators make the penmanship a puzzle. Alexander Dumas says that plain penmanship is the mark of incapacity. Then there are some who, through too much demand upon their energies and through lack of time, lose the capacity of making the pen intelligent, and much of the writing of this world is indecipherable. We have seen piles of inexplicable chirography, and we ourselves have helped augment the magnitude. We have not been sure of the name signed, the sentiment expressed, or whether the reply was affirmative or negative. Through indistinct penmanship last wills and testaments have been defeated, widows and orphans robbed of their inheritance, railroad trains brought into collision through the dim words of a telegram put into the hand of a conductor, and regiments, in the wise, mistaking their instructions, have been sacrificed in battle. I asked Bishop Cowie, in Auckland, New Zealand, the Bishop having been in many of the wars, what Tennyson, in his immortal poem "The Charge of the Light Brigade" meant by the words, "Some one had blundered," and the Bishop said that the fearful carnage at Balaklava was the result of an indistinctly-written and wrongly-ordered military order. "Some one had blundered." But your name, once written in the Lamb's Book of Life, will be so unmistakable that all heaven can read it at the glance. It will not be taken for the name of some other, so that in regard to it there shall come to be disputation. Not one of the millions and billions and quadrillions of the finally saved, will doubt that means you and only you. Oh, the glorious, the rapturous certitude of that entrance on the heavenly roll. Not saved in a promiscuous way. Not put into a specified mob. No, no! Though you are up, the worst sinner that was ever saved, and somebody, who knew you in this world at one time as absolutely abandoned and dissolute, should say, "I never heard of your conversion and I do not believe you have a right to be here," you could still laugh a laugh of triumph, and turn over the leaves containing the names of the redeemed, say, "Read it for your name. That is my name, written out in full, and do you not recognize the handwriting? A young scribe of heaven entered that name. An anonymous writer put it there. Do you not see the tremor in the lines? Do you not also see the boldness of the letters? Is it not as plain as yonder throne, as plain as yonder gate? Is not the handwriting unmistakable and the handwriting unmistakable? The crucified Lord wrote there the day I repented and turned. Hear it! Hear it! My name is written there!"

I have sometimes been tempted to think that there will be so many of us in heaven that we will be lost in the crowd. Each one of us will be as distinctly picked out and recognized as was Abel when he entered from earth, the very first one saved, and at the head of that long procession of sinners saved in all the centuries. My dear hearers, if we once there, I do not want it left uncertain whether we are to stay there. After and I get fairly settled there, in our heavenly home, we do not want our title proved defective. We do not want to be edged from the heavenly premises. We do not want some one to say, "This is your room in the house of many mansions."

you have on an attire that you ought to have taken from the heavenly wardrobe, and that is not really your name on the books. If you had more carefully examined the writing in the register at the gate, you would have found that the name was not yours at all, but mine. Now move out, while I move in." Oh, what wickedness, after once worshipping in heavenly temples, to be compelled to turn your back on the music, and after having joined the society of the blessed, to be fated to quit it forever, and after having enjoyed your long-lost kindred in heavenly embrace, to have another separation! What an agony would there be in such a going-by to heaven! Glory be to God on him that our names will be so plainly written in those volumes that neither sat, nor cherub, nor seraph, nor archangel shall doubt it for one moment, for in hundred eternities, if there were room for so many. The oldest inhabitant of heaven can read it, and the child that left its mother's lap last night for heaven can read it. You will not just look at your name and close the book, but you will stand, and soliloquize, and say, "Is it not wonderful that my name is there at all? How much it cost my Lord to get it there? Worthy am I to have it in the same book with the sons and daughters of martyrdom and with the choice spirits of all time! But there it is, and so plain the word and so plain all the letters!" And you will turn forward and backward the leaves and see other names there, perhaps your father's name, and your mother's name, and your brother's name, and your sister's name, and your wife's name, and apostolic names, and say, "I am not surprised that the names are here recorded. They were there before I ever was. But astonishment and overwhelming, that my name is in this book!" And turning back to the page on which is inscribed your name, you will stand and look at it, until seeing that others are waiting to examine the records with reference to their own names, you step back into the ranks of the redeemed, and with them to talk over the wonderment. Again, if you are so happy as to find your name in the volumes of eternity, you will find it written indelibly. Go up to the State Department in this national capital and see the old treaties signed by the rulers of foreign nations just before or just after the beginning of this century, and you will find that some of the documents are faded out that you can read only here and there a word. From the paper, yellow with age, or the parchment unrolled before you, time has effaced line after line. You have to guess at the name, and perhaps guess wrongly. Old Time is represented as carrying a scythe, with which he cuts down the generations; but he carries also chemicals with which he eats up whole paragraphs from important documents. We talk about indelible ink, but there is no such thing as indelible ink. It is only a question of time, the complete obliteration of all earthly signatures and engagements. But your name, put in the heavenly record, all the millenniums of heaven cannot dim it. After you have been so long in glory that, did you not possess imperishable memory, you would have forgotten the day of your entrance, your name on that page will glow as vividly on the instant it was traced there by the finger of the Great Atoner. There will be new generations coming into heaven, and a thousand years from now, from this far other planet, souls may enter the any-mansioned residence, and though your name was once plainly on the books, suppose it should fade out. How could you prove to the newcomers that it had ever been written there at all? Indelible! Indelible of being cancelled! Eternity as helpless as time in any attempt at erasure! What a reinforcing, uplifting thought! Other records in heaven may give out, and will give out. There are records there in which the Recording Angel writes down our names, but it is a book full of blots, so that much of the writing there cannot be read or even guessed at. The Recording Angel did the writing, but our Saviour put in the blots; for did he not promise, "I will blot out their transgressions!" And if some one in heaven should remember some of our earthly iniquities and ask God about them, the Lord would say, "Oh, I forgot them. I completely forgot those sins, for I promised, 'Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.'" In the fires that burn up our world all the safety deposits, and all the title deeds, and all the halls of record, and all the libraries will disappear, worse than when the 200,000 volumes and the 700,000 manuscripts of the Alexandrian Library went down under the torch of Omar, and not a leaf or word will escape the flame in that last conflagration, which I think will be witnessed by other planets, whose inhabitants will exclaim, "Look! There is a world on fire." But there will be only one conflagration in heaven, and that will not destroy but irradiate! I mean the conflagration of splendors that blaze on the towers and domes, and temples and thrones, and rubbed and diamonded walls in the light of the sun that never sets. Indelible!

There is not on earth an autograph letter or signature of Christ. The only time he wrote out a word on earth, though he knew so well how to write, he wrote with reference to having it soon shuffled out by human foot, the time that he stooped down and with his finger wrote on the ground the hypocrisy of the Pharisees. But when he writes your name in the heavenly archives, as I believe he has or hope he may, it is to stay there from age to age, from cycle to cycle, from æon to æon. And so for all you Christian people I do what John G. Whittier, the dying poet, said he wanted done in his home. Lovely man he was! I sat with him in a hay mow a whole summer afternoon, and heard him tell the story of his life. He had for many years been troubled with insomnia and was a very poor sleeper, and he always had the window-curtain of his room up so as to see the first intimation of sunrise. When he was breathing his last, in the morning hour, in his home in the Massachusetts village, the nurse thought that the light of the rising sun was too strong for him, and so pulled the window-curtain down. The last thing the great Quaker poet did was to wave his hand to have the curtain up. He wanted to depart in the full gush of the morning. And I thought it might be helpful and inspiring to all Christian souls to have more light about the future, and so I pull up the curtain in the glorious sunrise of my text and say, "Rejoice that your names are written in heaven." Bring on your doxologies! Wave your palms! Shout your victories! Pull up all the curtains of bright expectations! Yea! hoist the window itself, and let the perfume of the "morning glories" of the King's garden come in, and the music of harps all a-tremble with symphonies, and the sound of the surf of seas dashing to the foot of the throne of God and the Lamb.

But there is only one word on all this subject of Divine chirography in heaven that confuses me, and that is the small adverb which St. John adds when he quotes the text in Revelation and speaks of some "whose names are not written in the Book of Life of the Lamb slain." Oh, that awful adverb "not!" By full submission to Christ the Lord, have the way all cleared between you and the sublime registration of your name this moment. Why not look up and see that they are all ready to put your name among the blissful immortals? There is the mighty volume: it is wide open. There is the pen: it is from the wing of the "Angel of the New Covenant." There is the ink: it is red ink from Calvarean sacrifice. And there is the Divine Scribe: the glorious Lord who wrote your father's name there, and your mother's name there, and your child's name there, and who is ready to write your name there. Will you consent that he do it? Before I say "Amen" to this service, ask him to do it. I wait a moment for the tremendous action of your will, for it is only an action of your will. Here someone says, "Lord Jesus, with pen plucked from angelic wing, and dipped in the red ink of Golgotha, write there either that which is now my earthly name or that which shall be my heavenly name." I pause a second longer, that all may consent. The pen of the Divine Scribe is in the fingers and is lifted and is lowered, and it touches the shining page, and the word is traced, in trembling and bold and unmistakable letters. He has put it down in the right place.

'Tis done! The great transaction's done. I am my Lord's, and he is mine.

And if there be in all this assembly a hopeless case, so-called hopeless by yourself and others, I take the responsibility of saying that there is a place in that Book where your name would exactly fit in, and look beautiful, and you can, quicker than I can clap my hands together, have it there. A religious meeting was thrown open, and all those who could testify of the converting grace of God were asked to speak. Silence reigned a moment, and then a man covered with the marks of dissipation arose and said, "You can see from my looks what I have been, but I am now a saved man. When I left home a thousand miles from here I had so disgraced my father's name that he said, 'As you are going away I have only two things to ask of you, first that you will never come home again, and next you will change your name.' I promised. I have not heard my real name for years. I went the whole round of sin, until there was no lower depth to fathom. But I am by the grace of God a changed man. I wrote home asking forgiveness for my waywardness, and here are two letters, one from father and another from my sister. My mother died of a broken-heart. But these two letters ask me to come home, and boys I start to-morrow morning." The fact was that his name was written in heaven, where I pray God all of our names may be written though so unworthy are the best of us, and all of us. If you have ever been in the thick woods and heard the sound of village bells you know the sound is hindered and muffled by the foliage, though somewhat sweet, but as you come to the edge of the woods, the sounds become clearer, and more charming, and when you step out from the deep shadows into the sunlight you hear the full, round, mellifluous ringing of the bells. Oh! ye, down in the thick shadows of unbelief and who hear only the faint notes of this Gospel bell, come out into the clear sunlight of pardon and peace, and hear the full chime of eternal harmonies from all the towers of heaven. Oh! Come out of the woods!

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

A Columbus Relic.

ONE of the sights pointed out to visitors in Funchal, Madeira, is an old and extremely dilapidated building, which is said to have been at one time honored by the occupancy of Christopher Columbus.

A writer in Black and White, says:

Perestrelo was Governor of Porto Santo, and Columbus married his daughter. He lived for some time at Madeira, and on his third voyage of discovery, in 1498, touched at both Porto Santo and Madeira. Funchal is the capital of the Madeira group of islands, in the North Atlantic. It is believed that the islands were first discovered by Phœnicians at a very early period. The inhabitants are of Portuguese descent, with a mixture of negro and Moorish blood among the lower classes. Funchal is one of the hottest localities in the tropics, has a beautiful site, picturesque with foliage and rich in color, and with a variety of tropical fruits and flowers in the greatest profusion. Apart from the beautiful scenery and the climate, however (which is especially beneficial to certain classes of invalids), there is little to tempt strangers to linger in those lonely Atlantic islands. The people are ignorant and bigoted, and Christian work encounters difficulty and opposition. The war vessels of the United States and Great Britain, as well as merchantmen of several European nations call at Funchal. Missionaries have opportunities to do good among their crews. There are Sailors' Homes and Rests there, where seamen find comfort and protection from vice and the contamination of bad companions.

"The Sorrowing Tree."

In a recent writing, Dr. Talmage incidentally referred to a rather remarkable tree in India, which he called "the sorrowing tree." In the Indian Witness of Calcutta, of a recent date we find the following comprehensive description of this strange tree:

"Rev. A Campbell of Pokurea, confirms a previous correspondent's identification of Dr. Talmage's 'sorrowing tree' with the botanical Nyctanthes Arborescens, and adds: 'The flowers are much used in Hindu worship, and as native offerings. The plant is supposed to have been brought from heaven by the god Krishna for his wife Satyabhama. A tale given in the Vishnu Purana explains the origin of the name Parijatika. This shrub was a king's daughter, named Parijatika. She fell in love with the sun, who soon deserted her, on which she killed herself and was burnt. This shrub rose from her ashes. Hence it casts its flowers in the morning, as it cannot bear the sight of the sun.'

A Blind Girl's Love for Jesus.

"One of the happiest girls I ever saw," writes Rev. J. C. Ryle, "was a little girl whom I once met in a railroad carriage. She was eight years old and quite blind; but she was quite happy and contented. She said, when she got into the carriage, 'Tell me how many people there are in the carriage, for I am quite blind, and can see nothing.' A gentleman asked her if she was not afraid. 'No,' she said, 'I have travelled before, and I trust in God, and people are always very good to me.' But I soon found out the reason why she was so happy. She loved Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ loved her; for already she had sought and found Him."

Solomon's Wealth and Wisdom

Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 18. I. Kings

4: 25-34. Golden Text. I. Samuel 2: 30.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HEM that honor me I will honor, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed" (I. Sam. 2: 30). We have seen how, in the beginning of his reign, the youthful Solomon honored his God. And God, according to his promise, honored him by giving him the riches and honor which he forbore to ask of him. His kingdom was larger than it had ever been, extending from the river (Euphrates) unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt; they (i. e., the subdued and conquered inhabitants) brought presents, and served Solomon all the days of his life. The provision for his court in one day was enormous. "For he had dominion over all the region on this side the river, from Tiphshah (quite in the northeast) to Azzah (or Gaza in the southwest), over all the kings on this side the river, and he had peace on all sides round about him" (I. Kings 4: 24). Solomon was to be the subdued provinces, as well as the land conquered by Joshua, must have prospered under his rule, which was a rehearsal of the reign of Christ upon earth when he shall reign in righteousness. Ps. 72 is in a measure descriptive of the reign of Solomon, but still more prophetic of the reign of Christ. In Solomon's time the righteous did flourish and abundance of peace, but not "so long as the moon endureth." "They that dwell in the wilderness" did bow before Solomon, the kings of Tarshish and of the isles did bring presents, and the kings of Sheba and Seba offer gifts, but "all kings" did not "fall down before him;" all nations "did not serve him" (Ps. 72: 7-11). But these works shall be literally fulfilled in the future reign of Christ. It was, however, indeed a time of blessedness when Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree, from Dan even unto Beersheba, all the days of Solomon. He was like his forefather, Abraham, blest and made a blessing.

"And God gave Solomon wisdom as he promised him." (I. Kings 4: 29.) The terms of his promise were, "a wise and understanding heart, so that there was none like thee before thee, neither after thee shall any arise like unto thee," (I. Kings 3: 12), and the terms of the fulfillment, "God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand that is on the seashore. And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country and all the wisdom of Egypt, for he was wiser than all men," surprising all who heard him. "And his fame was in all nations round about."

Have we not something to learn here? In this day of pressure in the schools, of the pressure of the world, of the pressure of the students, of mental powers in numerous cases ruined for life in the attempt to acquire knowledge, and sound wisdom; "Counsel is mine, and sound wisdom; I am understanding?" (Prov. 8: 14.) O if the ambitious greed for honor could give way to a calm real, lasting, and fruitful knowledge would be obtained and retained, and study, far from being the feverish thing it often is, would be a pleasant and fruitful pursuit.

outcome of communion with him? Then the successful young student, instead of being inflated with pride, would acknowledge his dependence upon him who had answered his prayer and given him understanding. This was so at first with Solomon, he could attribute to his own unaided researches the masterly acquaintance which he had of all kinds of knowledge. Many a diligent student is proud to have mastered one branch of learning; but Solomon, divinely instructed by his God, when he was author of three thousand proverbs, and so excelled in moral philosophy, was also a poet, and wrote "a thousand and five songs;" but none the less was he a naturalizer and a botanist. No dependence and the dependence of his people from his God. God would always have his children expect from him alone.

There was also a special reason stated why a king of God's people should not like the heathen kings around him multiply wives unto himself. Not only was it God's order from the beginning that a man should have one wife but also in connection with the special prohibition God says "that his heart turn not away," and it is sadly stated of Solomon that "his wives—seven hundred in number,—turned away his heart."

And he was not greatly to multiply to himself gold and silver. "To himself," spoken three times. This is the keynote of the whole prohibition. God must be supreme in all, then a life, whether of small or of great gifts, is a life full of the savor of Christ and a blessing to all around.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

SOLOMON is presented to us in the lesson in the threefold character of a king, a merchant and a philosopher. As a king, he introduced Israel to the first spectacle it had yet had of the magnificence and state and pomp of an Oriental court. In his later years David had surrounded himself with luxury and dependencies by sea, was there extensive trade. From Tarshish, which is believed to have been in Spain, and from Ophir, which is thought to have been the Hebrew name for India, Solomon's ships manned by Hiram's sailors brought costly products to add to the splendors of the capital. There appears to have been general prosperity at that time, but it must have been short-lived. That the king's personal treasury was high exhausted seems probable, otherwise he would not have been willing to let twenty cities of Galilee to Hiram, in payment of that monarch's claim upon him. It was a direct contravention of the covenant with his people when he gave them the land. But Solomon is not to be having brought himself by extravagance into a situation in which sin against God has seemed the only way of getting out of a difficulty.

During the early years of the reign people appear to have taken pride in his king, and especially in the astuteness and penetration he displayed. Many traditions are still preserved in the Talmud of his wonderful wisdom. Doubtless many of the Proverbs in our Bibles are his, but of the thousand and five songs with which he is credited, not one remains which we can be sure he wrote, unless it is the one that bears his name, of which there is some doubt. Neither in the Proverbs or in the Song do we find the deep wisdom which, with all his faults, characterized David. Nor could his influence have been so beneficial to the nation as that of his father, though David was far inferior to him in culture and learning. His reign is reckoned as the period when Israel reached the zenith of her national greatness, but it was not the period of her most eminent service. Israel's mission was that of a religious teacher of the nations, and this function is not developed by wealth or luxury. The world's debt to Israel is that which incurred when she was in sorrowful suffering, when David wrote his Psalms and Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Ash wrote their immortal works. Neither the nation, nor an individual, are wealthy or wise sufficient of themselves to show goodness, which is a higher if less brilliant characteristic.

Wiser than all men. The Rabbis' books contain many stories of Solomon's wisdom which was most esteemed in his days, the detection of an impostor, the case of the two women who claimed the child (I. Kings 3: 16-28), and the solution of enigmas and dark sayings. One of the instances cited is that the Queen of Sheba brought into Solomon's presence a number of boys and girls, and bade him tell the boys from the girls. He ordered basins of water brought, saying, "Let the boys go first, and let them wash their hands." The boys, from habit, at once put their hands in the water, the girls stopped to turn back their sleeves. Another tradition says the Queen applied was to hold in her hand two bouquets, one of real flowers and the other of exquisitely made artificial flowers, and asked Solomon without moving from his throne to distinguish between them. He ordered the lattice to be opened and bees came in and settled on the real flowers. Another legend is of a judgment man bought a house, and digging in the cellar, found a treasure. The king was required to decide whether the treasure belonged to the purchaser who found it, or to the vendor to whom the house had longed. Solomon suggested that the vendor's son should marry the purchaser's daughter, and should have the treasure, which was done, and all were content.

They lacked nothing. Solomon's wisdom provided so fully for all his retainers that they lacked nothing. But the phrase is only to physical needs. Not even the wealth of Solomon could purchase for one all that he needed. The mental and spiritual qualities necessary to happiness cannot be acquired by riches, and there have been occasions when they could supply physical needs. Peloubet tells the story of a Russian who was in a diamond mine, and filled his pockets with the best and purest of the stones. He was beyond the dreams of avarice. But he lost his way in the mine and was unable to get out for several days. He grew fearful, hungry and thirsty. It seemed as if he would surely die. All the strains of being concentrated on his cry for help. He would have given the largest of the diamonds, or indeed all the diamonds in one glass of water. He was dying of thirst, and the jewels were useless.

SOLOMON'S GARDENS AT WADY URTAS, NEAR BETHLEHEM.

man living ever had so varied and extensive a style of knowledge as this man who possessed a hearing heart. And yet the same Word of God which tells us of his disinterestedness in the choice he made of the blessings which God had offered him, tells of how, not content with the riches which came from God, he multiplied them in the very things forbidden him in the Word of God.

The king whom the children of Israel would set over them was not to "multiply horses to himself," nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses. He was not to "multiply wives to himself that his heart turn not away," he was not greatly to "multiply to himself silver and gold" (Deut. 17: 17). Yet all these things Solomon did. Not content with the glory which God gave him, he sought to increase it, and so failed to take the warning which God attached to this prohibition to the kings of Israel.

God had his special purposes in three distinct things which he had prohibited to the reigning sovereigns of Israel. Solomon in multiplying horses in having "forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, was gathering around him an outward strength grandeur, but his court was simple and plain compared with that of his son. The narrative mentions various officers, such as the Chamberlain, the Remembrancer and the officer "over the tribute," which indicates a court organized on the pattern of other Oriental monarchs. His retinue must have been enormous. The list is given of the provisions which were consumed daily in the palace and they are sufficient to feed from ten to twelve thousand persons. The cost of the household was stupendous. The king's annual income is given (I. Kings 10: 14), as six hundred and sixty-six talents of gold. Scholars differ as to the amount this represents in our money, but Dean Farrar thinks it must have been over twenty million dollars. When we consider that the size of the kingdom was only half the size of the State of New York we can understand how heavily the people must have been taxed, even after allowing liberally for the tribute of subject kings and the presents of visitors. It is easy to see from the petition of the people to his son and successor (I. Kings 12: 4.), that the burden must have been very heavy.

There was an enormous development of commerce during Solomon's reign. Not only in spices from Arabia and horses from Egypt, but in the more venturesome expe-

v. Wm. E. Geil's Adventures among the Druses — How a Moslem Pasha was Thwarted—Gallant Mountaineers.

TURKISH MOUNTED ARTILLERY ON THE MARCH.

FOR the last six months, Rev. Wm. E. Geil of Doylestown, Pa., has been sojourning in the East. In the letter typed below, written specially for this paper, he relates his experiences among the Druses of the Hauran:

The Druse nation is divided into three parts. There are the Lebanon Druses, numbering about 200,000, and who live in the great cedars are, coming under an international instrument called Regle du Liban, which provides that they shall be free from conscription, ruled by a Christian governor, and have the protection of the treaty powers. They may, however, be called on to do militia service. Though this region Turkish soldiers go every few days, visiting the homes of the people to discover whether any of the people have gone to the Hauran to fight against the star and crescent of the Sultan and the green flag of the Prophet.

In northern Palestine may be found some twenty-five villages of Druses who are more off than their kin elsewhere. They receive no protection, nor are they able to protect themselves. They are subject to conscription, and 'tis sad, and truthfully, I think, that about of every ten Druse recruits sent from the Turkish Army in a year's time. This is not due to the Druses being cowards, for they are famous for their bravery; but because not being Mohammedans, the Turkish officers claim that their souls (if they have any), are less valuable than the Moslems'; hence they put them in the front of the army, where they are sure to be killed, and killed first. When they desert they flee to the Jebel Hauran, where it is not possible for the Turkish authorities to capture them.

The third division is in the Hauran. The Sultan's firman, which was issued while I was in that country, was for the subduing or annihilation of this last and most warlike division of the Druses. Some months previous to the issuing of this firman a Turkish army was sent against the Druses in the north of Palestine, and at Mejel-est-shems some hundred men were murdered by the Sublime Porte's army. In this war their coils were shuffled off: a soldier would shoot a Druse in the leg, then place a slip around his feet; the other end of this rather novel foot-cuffs having been fastened to the saddle-girth, the soldier would follow down the rut, across the plain, dragging the wounded man till his brains were emptied out of his skull upon the ground. This is what the Turk calls fun! Others of the troops compelled the women and children to flee to the snow-covered mountains.

Two weeks afterward some sixteen were found frozen to death. One woman with a little boy clinging to her garments on the side of her and a little girl on the other, were discovered stiff and quite dead.

After this the government (which over the Druses is another name for Satan), thinking the Druses were subdued, sent a pasha and troops to the Hauran to collect a heavy tax. In one village owning between six and seven hundred acres of cultivated land the tax was some £330 being probably $2.30 tax on an acre of land, the market value of which was $4.00. These people refused to pay, but made no hostile demonstrations.

The new Pasha did not try to force the collection of the tax, but fell in love with a beautiful Druse lady; he paid his respects to her quite frequently and finally wanted to marry her, which simply meant he had in mind a new inmate for his harem; she knowing the uselessness of refusing, set the day as distant as possible and at once notified the Druse chiefs. The wedding-day arrived. The Pasha sent a guard of honor of twenty-five cavalry to bring her to the palace. She refused, they laid hands on her, when suddenly rifle shots were heard and the whole troop lay dead. When the General received the news, he was mighty wroth and swore by the Koran and the green flag of Islam that he would immediately punish the infidels and ordered a regiment of eight hundred men and two cannon to do the work. The Koran forbids the use of intoxicating drinks, except just previous to a battle. The soldiers were served with liquors, and started with high glee to punish the men with rifle balls and the women by slavery. Well, the Druses were ready. Four hundred men made as if to charge the Turkish regiment, then turned and ran. Orders were given to follow double-quick; the ambush was complete, the troops entered the trap. Quickly surrounded by the mountain-hunters, eight hundred men lay dead—all who came, save two and they were sent back to tell the Pasha that all who insult Druse women would share the same fate. This is the story given in confidence by a government official from the Hauran, and the account was heard by myself in Damascus.

I crossed the Plain of Esdraelon with four thousand men of the Turkish army going to exterminate the Druses. One Moslem said to me, "I'd like to go and kill a Druse." Why? I asked. He quickly gave reply: "To get his donkey." A human life for a donkey, "too cheap," I answered. He only smiled. The women and children of the soldiers were nearly wild with grief. They did not expect to ever see their men folks again. There are about sixty thousand Druses in the Hauran Mountains; fifteen thousand of them are said to be warriors, armed with the Martini rifle and capable of taking a bird on the wing with a musket ball. In Asia, I've heard it said, that a Turkish soldier shoots thirty times before he hits anything, but that a Druse never shoots unless he has a place to put the ball.

Hence the Sultan's recent order that twelve more battalions be sent against the Druses, may be understood that the thousands of armed men, many of whom I saw on the plains of Palestine and marching through the streets of Damascus, are by this time underground. The government called together all the chiefs of the Bedouins in that region, and after giving them beautiful and costly robes, asked them to form a cordon around the Legar, which is a volcanic plateau, whence the Druse have retired and not to allow any one to come in or go out, and the government would do the "finishing," and that all the cattle and goods should go to the Bedouins. The chiefs agreed, but I learned when on the slopes of Mt. Hermon that the Druses had sent their women and children far eastward to the tents of the desert Bedouin, and that the nearby tribes were proving friendly to the besieged.

Training Syrian Girls.

From Mrs. Rebecca Jamal, of Jerusalem, who is conducting Training Classes among the poor, neglected Syrian girls of Jerusalem, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a letter, from which we make the following extracts: "Two of my class girls have been married last month, after being three full years in my class. One of the bride-grooms had received a good account of the character of the girl from her neighbors. He informed me on the day of the wedding, 'I am quite content,

A CITIZEN OF CANA.

CANA, the scene of Christ's first miracle, was a thriving village on the great highway through the hills west of the Sea of Galilee. From the main road a number of narrow, irregular streets wandered up and down along a low hillside, and were bordered by houses that were built mostly of stone. The inhabitants had need for thrift and industry, if it were only because of the tax-gatherers. There were no signs of actual poverty in the vicinity of the well, writes a traveler. It stood several paces in front of a dwelling two stories in height, which seemed somewhat better than its neighbors. The porch along its lower story was thickly clad with vines, and from under these a girl had come to bring her jar to the well. A Jewish maiden of nearly fifteen was accounted a full-grown woman. Ranged on either side of the well were six large, cumbrous-looking waterpots of stoneware, partly filled for the convenience of any person wishing to perform the hand or foot ablutions required by the exacting ceremonial law of the Jews.

The vine-clad porch was a pleasant place. It was provided with wooden benches, and on one of these sat a man who seemed to consider himself a person of importance. Every movement, and even his attitude when sitting still, might be said to accord with a conviction that he, Rabbi Isaac Ben Nassur, was the wisest and the most learned man in Cana. He was very tall, as well as broad and heavy, and his thick, gray beard came down to the voluminous sash which was folded around his waist. He was dressed as became a rabbi, or any other highly respectable Jew, in a long linen tunic with sleeves, which was belted by the sash. Over this he wore a long, loosely-flowing robe, called an "abba," also of linen. Around his shoulders, with the ends falling in front, was a broad, white woolen scarf, with narrow bars of red, purple, and blue, and with blue tassels at the corners of each of its two ends. This was the "tallith," and was worn as a reminder that the wearer must remember all the commandments of the law and faithfully perform them.

The World's Largest School.

The largest school in the world is one mainly supported by Lord Rothschild, in one of the worst slums of London. There are in it thirty-five hundred children, coming from the families of the poorest foreign Jews, and there are a hundred teachers. It is well known that this is Lord Rothschild's pet institution, and were it not for his munificent support the school would be unable to meet its vast expenditure. It is owing to his generosity that free breakfasts are given every morning to all children who wish to take them, no questions being asked. Again, he presents every boy with a suit of clothes and a pair of boots, and every girl with a dress and a pair of boots in the month of April, near the Jewish Passover. An idea of the poverty of the children may be had from the fact that not more than two per cent. decline to avail themselves of this charity. A second pair of boots is offered in the month of October to every child whose boots are not likely to last during the approaching winter. It is scarcely necessary to state that few do not get them. A very popular feature in the school is the savings bank department, instituted by the president. In order to encourage habits of thrift, he allows an interest of ten per cent. per annum on all savings. The teachers are also permitted to avail themselves of the benefits of this bank.

so far as she has been educated under your care.' What still more delighted me was, to see that all her clothes has been cut and sewed by herself; this also astonished her relations greatly.

"Thank God for the fruits we see from time to time! That is all owing to the kind contributors, who have really given a great help and uplift to these poor ignorant girls. I hope many hearts will sympathize with them, and help them and their reward will be in heaven.

WORKING IN THE VINEYARD.

IN the vineyard of our Father
Daily work we find to do;
Scattered gleanings we may gather,
Though we are but young and few;
Little clusters
Help to fill the garner, too.
Toiling early in the morning,
Catching moments through the day,
Nothing small or lowly scorned,
While we work, and watch, and pray;
Gathering gladly,
Free-will offerings by the way.
Not for selfish praise or glory,
Not for objects nothing worth,
But to send the blessed story
Of the Gospel o'er the earth,
Telling mortals
Of our Lord and Saviour's birth.
Up and ever at our calling,
Till in death our lips are dumb,
Or till, sin's dominion falling,
Christ shall in his kingdom come,
And his children
Reach their everlasting home.

DRUSE SHEIK.

HELPED TO BETTER LIVES.

How a Band of Christian Ladies in Brooklyn are Laboring to Reclaim their Fallen Sisters and Restore them to Society through the Bethesda Home.

THE scene depicted in the picture on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week has a special interest for our readers. The Bethesda Home has, from the beginning, had the prayers, sympathy and the pecuniary support of Christian people who have read of its work in this journal. Their letters, accompanying their contributions, show that they esteem it a joy and a privilege to co-operate in this Christ-like effort to raise the fallen and rescue the perishing. The consecrated ladies who manage the Home have been greatly cheered by these kindly messages of sympathy and by the knowledge that all over the Union, prayers are going up to the throne of God for his blessing on their efforts. They have, also, felt deeply grateful for the contributions which have enabled them to pay the rent and the current expenses of the Home. They give their labor without recompense to the work and as they toil on amid discouragements and disappointments, they have felt the inspiration that comes from the sympathy of people of like faith with themselves. Our readers who have made the existence of this Home possible, by their generous gifts, will be glad to learn how God is blessing the effort put forth in his strength and how many and fervent are the expressions of gratitude that have come from the poor creatures who were ready to perish, but have through its instrumentality been lifted out of the mire and restored to society.

The cooking-school represented in the picture is a feature of the work suggested by experience in the difficult task of reclaiming the girls from their lives of sin. Many of those who have come to the Home could be restored to their families, when they become truly penitent, and it has been a delightful duty in those cases to carry to the home desolated by a calamity worse than death, the glad news that the lost has been found, and the daughter who was dead is alive again. Many a home of darkness and bitter sorrow has thus been made the scene of rejoicing through the work in the Bethesda Home, and fervent blessings from the lips of godly fathers and mothers have been poured on the heads of the workers there. But there were other girls who came to the Home, for whom there was no such welcome waiting. Parents dead, and all friends alienated, there was no one to rejoice over their rescue, no one to make provision for their necessities. In many instances such conditions had preceded their fall, and in some, had been the occasion of it. Hearts that craved love as a necessity of their existence were easily deceived by the lust, which is its hideous counterfeit, and were led to ruin through the impulses which, under happier circumstances, would have rendered them the joy and pride of some honest man's home. With a heartlessness and cruelty, which few find the beginning, they realized the terrible fate which awaited them, and the victim is cast off without compunction and left to go to ruin in her own way. No more terrible fate can be conceived than that of a girl thus flung on the streets to perish. Shut out by her fall from every decent home, every avenue of livelihood closed against her, there seems no future before her but to sink from one stage of infamy to another, until the cold river seems to be a kinder fate than the world. Ye delicate ladies who gather up your garments as you pass such a woman, lest you be contaminated by her very touch, might well spare her a thought of pity as you pass. "Ye know her sins; ye know not her sorrows," nor the hard fate which has made her so different from yourselves.

There is a significant pathos in the surprise such women often manifest when some lady, with the spirit of the master, greets them kindly. They are evidently so unused to it, so unprepared for it. In the letters that come to the Bethesda Home from girls who are living a new life through its efforts and in the testimony of those who lovingly visit it, as their spiritual birth-place, this surprise is again and again referred to. They confess that it was the kindness and sympathy that broke them down and overcame their hollow ribaldry or their sullen defiance. It is with them, as it was with her to whom the Master said: "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more;" they melt under the power of love, when they would have repaid scorn with scorn.

The practical question, however, must always arise, even after the girl's heart has been changed and she resolves to lead a new life in Christ's strength, which the managers of the Bethesda Home believe to be the only sure ground for hope in her permanent reclamation—the question how when she has no parents or relatives to care for her, she can earn an honest livelihood. Neither she, nor her new friends, wish her to be a permanent pensioner on the benefactions of the Christian public. Yet, in the majority of the cases that have come to the Bethesda Home, the girl has no knowledge of anything by which she can support herself.

Many of them know absolutely nothing of domestic affairs and some of them do not even know how to sew. With the best wishes and the most intense desire to lead an honest life, they have no ability which can command compensation. Early in the history of the home this difficulty was anxiously pondered by the managers. Happily in Miss Kate Dolan, the matron of the Home, they had an officer who could instruct the girls in the rudiments of domestic service and in plain sewing. They were anxious to learn and their readiness to do work that they would formerly have considered menial, was recognized as an evidence of the sincerity of their desire to reform. There has never been any need of a servant in the Home. The inmates have vied with each other in their exertions to keep it immaculately neat and clean. At first their work might be clumsy and ill-done, but they soon became expert and many for whom places were secured have given thorough satisfaction in domestic service.

Something better than kitchen drudgery was needed, however, for many who had received a fair education and had been accustomed, while living lives of sin, to the luxuries and attentions that their ill-gotten gains could purchase. The Managers of the Home were reluctant to devote the funds, so urgently needed in the initial stages of their work, to the salaries of teachers, as they would have done if abundant means had been at their disposal. They were relieved of their difficulty by the kindly offer of two ladies connected with the Pratt Institute. Miss Helen H. Marshall volunteered to give a weekly lesson in cooking and Miss White undertook to teach the inmates the higher mysteries of needlework. A beginning was made in the practical education of the girls. Each of the inmates constructed white half-sleeves, caps and aprons for herself, on the same pattern as her teacher's and thus arrayed, the weekly cooking-lesson has been a pleasant and profitable one.

during the past season. Practical experiments have enlisted the general interest, and the intelligent questions put and cheerfully answered have made the evening one of the most delightful of the week. The sewing class has proved equally popular, and both classes have been as much a pleasure to the teachers as to the learners. The girls who have gone out from the Home during the past season have thus been much more valuable in the homes secured for them than if they had not received instruction.

The unalloyed success of the experiment encourages the managers to hope that during the coming season a further extension of the educational advantages of the Home may be made. There are some of the girls who have become at various times inmates of the Home who might have succeeded as milliners or dressmakers, if they had received competent instruction. Others again were better qualified to become clerks if they could have been taught shorthand and type-writing. Possibly during the coming season experts in these arts may be found with the desire to aid in the glorious rescue work, who will give their services as a contribution to the undertaking.

It has also been suggested that a laundry might be established, which would do something toward replenishing a treasury which is necessarily afflicted with chronic emptiness. Any enterprise that promises this result will be eagerly adopted, for there is no lesson more conspicuously obvious than the one that there are unlimited opportunities for usefulness, if there were means to take advantage of them.

At the present time every bed in the house is occupied every night, but there are empty rooms which might be struggle that the older women have lagged in trying to overcome it. Two of the number were so moved by the appeal of the Managers of the Home and, at the same time so distrustful of themselves, that they applied voluntarily to the institution for commitment to a State institution in order that for a definite period they be forcibly prevented from falling back into habits that at the Bethesda Home they had learned to regard with loathing and horror.

Of the girls who have been reclaimed the testimonies received of their conduct have been most encouraging. In all cases employers were informed of their past that no dread of discovery might hinder the girls in their future. The uniform reply to all inquiries has been given by employers, that they are honest, industrious and well-behaved. A correspondence is maintained with the girls themselves, who were at a distance, by Miss Eginton, the President of the Board of Managers, or by some of the other members on the Board, and those who are in the city are visited and are encouraged to do the Home, when they can leave their duties. There is often in the Home a gathering of former inmates that gladdens the hearts of the managers, as they pour forth their gratitude for the unspeakable blessings that have transformed their lives.

"When I think of what I was when I entered the Home," says one, "I am now herself engaged in rescue work, and think of what it did for me, my heart is so full of gratitude that I cannot find words to express it." Another writes: "God bless the Bethesda. May it continue to raise my poor, degraded sisters as it has raised me." Miss Meury, a well known Rescue Missionary, of the Women's Auxiliary City Mission, probably sees more of the female depravity of the city than any one else, says: "I am very much indebted to the Bethesda Home for the great help it has been to me, and still more to the poor friendless girls who have found such love there and have been led to Christ. I have been bringing fallen girls to the Home for three years past and it has been wonderful to witness the results. My hearty sympathy is with the Home and the Christian ladies who manage it."

It is with cheerful hearts, and more intense consecration that the managers are entering on the work of this season. They earnestly hope that in the future, in the past, they will have the practical sympathy and the practical aid of the readers of this journal.

The Berlin Exhibition.

During the late summer Berlin's attraction has been the "Gewerbestellung," or exhibition. It is worth noting, chiefly because it is essentially a man. There is a colossal telescope exhibition, called the "Riesen Fernrohr" or "Giant Spy Glass." The telephone, the "Fernsprecher" or "distant talk." The Exhibition is not very extensive, it is arranged in beautifully laid grounds with lakes and a profusion of flowers. It seems to have attracted many foreigners, but has been quite a success.

A LESSON IN SEWING AT THE BETHESDA HOME.

filled if they had anything in them beside the bare boards. Nor is there any lack of candidates for admission. In New York alone there are said to be over twenty thousand women of the class the Home seeks to rescue, and there are over ten thousand in Brooklyn, and it is the testimony of the girls who have been received that large numbers would gladly quit their lives of sin if the way could be opened to them. It is sad to think that so small a sum as that which would fully furnish and equip such an institution as the Bethesda Home is all that stands in the way of the salvation of more of these lost souls. The Home has fully proved its efficiency, and God has given it a rich blessing, but the harvest of souls might be still greater than it has yet been, and the fields are white with it, if there were the means to gather it.

During the past season over sixty girls have been rescued by the instrumentality of the Home, and it is believed that a large proportion of them have become true and sincere Christians. A much larger number have been inmates of the Home for longer or shorter periods, who have relapsed into their former life through various causes, but in by far the greater number, through their love of intoxicating liquor. This propensity is one of the most potent of the many obstacles that the workers have to contend with. In many instances it has been pitiful to witness the

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Little Child's Leading.

THE great house stood at the end of a beautiful avenue, and fronted a lovely lawn where the turf was like the greenest velvet, and over which elms and maples and stately spreading oaks cast their soft shadows. Birds had their homes in these green boughs, flowers and the borders of the grass, and in the fountain threw its silver spray in rainbow drops all the day long, till the sun went down. Inside, the home was filled with rare curios, brought from many lands by the traveling sons and daughters of the family; costly rugs lay on polished floors, and statues stood in niches and pictures adorned the walls. Everything which money could do, and taste could do, had been done to make the superb home a fit shrine for its inmates.

Until a month ago, the home had been very happy. Gay voices had resounded in the corridors, and merry feet had tripped through the long suites of rooms, and songs had floated down to the wide verandas from the chambers above. Suddenly a change fell on the music, and there came a hush of appalled silence and then the low sobbing of a broken-hearted mother, and her instant moaning, "My daughter, my daughter, my Marie, my child," over and over and over, till Marie's father and mother, weary with vain efforts to comfort the mourner, turned and left her in despair. Even the man whom Marie had married to wed was less grief-stricken than her desolate mother, for whom heaven and earth were alike hung with sackcloth.

Marie had been in full health one day, and the next. A heart trouble, quite unsuspected, had been stirred into action by the fright she sustained "when her mother ran away, and almost before the father and lover and brothers were aware of it Marie Wainwright was no more."

"Mrs. Wainwright cannot be roused from this stupor of agony, she will be the next to go," said one friend to another. Her pastor, her physician, her acquaintances tried in vain to create a diversion of her feelings, but they simply could not reach her. She was nothing the better for their attempts, but rather grew worse. He had no thought of the living Marie in his mind. Her Marie was dead, dead. Her own experience akin to his whom our poet Whittier had in mind when he wrote:

"A light for him who never sees Stars shine through his cypress trees, or Lowell, when his penning of "After the Burial" brought tears to sympathetic eyes,

"In the darkling gulfs of sorrow,
When the helpless feet strike out
To find amid breakers to leeward,
No footing so solid as doubt.

Doubt had laid its arrests on Mrs. Wainwright's faith, and she had for the moment lost her hold on Christ. There is no comfort to any soul in sorrow, unless that soul is clinging to the ever-living, ever-loving Saviour.

Down at the foot of the back garden, among the stables, past the gooseberry bushes and the current bushes and the kennel where the mastiff lived, and the hives where the bees made honey, there was a wreck of a house, in which the coachman lived. The coachman and his wife had no children, but every summer, little nieces and nephews from New York came to see him and a good time they had with Aunt Fanny and Uncle Dick, just as good a time as if the whole fair domain had been their family property. And in a way it was as much to enjoy, as if he had been its owner, and had to pay its taxes; perhaps more, for he had his share of the sky, and the river and the blue mountain range, and no one can buy or sell.

Life Edith McBarney heard her Uncle Dick and Aunt Fanny talking about the lady in the big house, and she felt very sorry for her. And when, one morning, Aunt Fanny was too busy with her green apples, the sauce, and dumplings and pies, that she was helping the cook to make, (who, poorthing, had burned her hand) to notice Edith who therefore rolled off on her own account.

The little girl in her sun-bonnet and blue checked gingham wandered along the winding paths and strolled through the gardens, never picking a flower, for she had been instructed not to touch any of the beautiful things which belonged to the people in the large house. But she looked at them and loved them as she looked, and presently she saw a door wide open, and a lady sitting in a low chair just beyond it. The lady's hands were crossed in her lap and her head was drooping. As the child came nearer she saw, wonderingly, that tears were falling on the lady's gown.

Edith walked up to her, the strange lady, and laid her little soft, chubby hand on her crossed ones.

"Yady!" she said solemnly, "Yady, stop crying! Crying is very naughty, yady!"

Mrs. Wainwright looked up, much astonished. There was reproach in the child's manner; reproach was in the large blue eyes. Edith herself was never permitted to cry, and she honestly thought it a very naughty thing to do.

"Little girl," said Mrs. Wainwright, "I cannot help crying. My heart aches, it feels like a stone. I have lost my darling daughter, and I must cry."

"Where is she lost to?" asked the little one. "Tan't you find her?"

"God took her away from me, dear. He has taken her to heaven, and I can't live without her."

"Heaven!" said the child reflectively; "Where is it, and isn't it as pretty there as it is here?"

"Much, much prettier," the lady answered, gathering the small questioner into her arms; "but I did not want Marie to go till I did. Why did God take my darling first?"

The question was not directed to the child, but hurled, as a challenge, against the blue smiling sky. Twenty times a day did this bereaved mother thus send her question to the ear of God.

But the child answered unexpectedly. "I s'pose he loved her so much, he wanted her up there in his house. Yady, don't you cry any more. God doesn't want you to cry."

Just that, in substance, her pastor and her friends had been telling her over and over, but she hardly took it in, till the message was given in the silver-sweet syllables of a little child's lips. Mrs. Wainwright arose like one of old, who anointed his head and washed his face and took up his kingly tasks.

"I shall go to him," said David the king, "but he shall not return to me."

So whispered the sad mother to herself, and taking Edith with her, she went to the dim and hushed room that had been her darling child's. She entered, opened the windows, and let in the excluded sunshine. On the wall hung Marie's portrait. A golden beam fell on the rare brown hair, and touched it as with a halo; the face was very winsome which smiled down at the mother and the small visitor.

"She is an angel now," said little Edith. An angel! Yes, and perhaps sent with comforting thoughts, who knows, to those she had left behind. And if not an angel, what is better a redeemed saint, forever with the Lord. Not at once, but by degrees, the consolations which are neither few nor small were poured from the living Christ, upon the material heart, and Mrs. Wainwright took up her life once more.

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood,
Stand dressed in living green.

But tear-blinded eyes cannot always discern them. Well for those who are led into peace as this sufferer was, by the hand of a child. Did not our Lord say, "Of such are the kingdom of heaven?"

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The Lesson of a Handkerchief.

On the occasion of John B. Gough's funeral, a little handkerchief was placed over the back of his chair—the latter being at the head of the coffin. The story of that handkerchief was once told by Mr. Gough in an address in New York. "I have in my house," he said, "a small handkerchief, not worth three cents to you; but you could not buy it from me. A woman brought it, and said to my wife, 'I am very poor; I would give him a thousand pounds if I had it, but I brought this.'"

"I married with the fairest and brightest prospects before me; but my husband took to drinking and things went wrong. The piano-forte my mother gave me and everything was sold, until at last I found myself in a miserable room. My husband lay drunk in the corner, and the child that was lying on my knee was restless. I sang, 'The light of other days has faded,' and wet my handkerchief through with tears.

"My husband," said she to my wife, 'met yours. He spoke a few words and gave a grasp of the hand, and now for six years my husband has been to me all that a husband can be to a wife, and we are getting our household goods together again. I have brought your husband the very handkerchief I wet through that night with my tears; and I want him, when he is speaking, to remember that he has wiped away those tears from me—I trust in God forever.'"

This little anecdote never failed to produce a marked impression on Mr. Gough's audiences, wherever he related it. He was especially fond of illustrating his point by brief, simple anecdotes, and they were always told with a pathos and an eloquence that thrilled and convinced the hearers. As a general thing the incidents were drawn from his own experience.

Daughters of the Pueblos.

Their Lot in Life is a Dreary One—Peculiar Customs of an Ancient People.

PROBABLY the dullest and most monotonous lives on this continent are those of the Pueblos of New Mexico and Arizona. There are nineteen of these villages in New Mexico, most of them very ancient, and their 8000 inhabitants obtain a livelihood by cultivating the soil, raising maize, wheat, vegetables, fruit, and cotton, and having also good-sized herds of cattle, horses, mules, goats, and sheep. As the climate is practically rainless, the land has to be irrigated by an intricate and extensive system of ditches.

The women of the Pueblos are taught in childhood the arts of spinning and weaving cotton and wool into fabrics for clothing and heavy blankets, and in manufacturing and decorating pottery.

In these Pueblo homes, which are almost all situated in regions very difficult of access, it may well be imagined that the domestic life of the women undergoes little change in the passing generations. Their houses are of stone or sun-dried brick, three or four stories high, and usually stand on the summit of some mesa, or isolated hill, so steep as to be almost inaccessible to an enemy. Lumber is a luxury, and is very little used. A few rude pieces of furniture constitute the equipment of a Pueblo house, a sheep-skin or two to sit upon, the floor for a table, a few pots, and some blankets being considered a sufficient assortment for all ordinary purposes. The girls and grown-up women have plenty of out-door work to do; they are, in fact, the drudges of the villages. Some of the woven cloth is very beautiful, and it is astonishing how they are able, with such primitive facilities, to turn out such work.

One of the photographs on this page represents a pair of young Pueblo girls in their ordinary attire for cold weather. Their blankets, heavy skirts, and peculiar footwear are all of native manufacture, and designed for comfort. It frequently happens that from birth to burial, a Pueblo girl does not venture beyond the confines of her native village. Of late years schools have been established among them and many of the young children are attending with good results.

A contrast to the Pueblo women is found in another of our photographs—that of an Indian woman of Tzucacalco, Mexico. The Mexican Indian women are of better stature and finer figure and they possess, besides, something of that grace which is peculiar to all Mexican women, patrician or humble. The Indian squaw, who comes with her papoose to sell produce in the markets of Mexico City, may stand as a model for a sculptor. Poorly clad as she is, her skirt and bodice are embroidered with rustic skill and the colored fibres used in the manufacture of the cloth give it a brilliant and picturesque appearance. Timid and gentle by nature, these Mexican mothers dearly love their children, and they carry them strapped to their backs in a sort of pillow, something after the fashion of the women of certain tribes of our northwestern Indians.

The Coming Elections.

AS our city, State and national ballot-boxes are soon to be appealed to for important decision, there are some things important to say on the right and wrong modes of conducting a political campaign. Of the two styles we may make selection. One way is to gather up the scum and slush and turpitude of a community into a great reservoir, and then let it run down through the appointed aqueducts on the candidates presented. Take the character of a man whom you do not expect to vote for and find out who his ancestry were, and if any of them were hanged or imprisoned or boodlers of public funds, make the son or the grandson now up for office suffer for it. Many of those who are hot against the theological theory that we suffer for Adam's transgression are glad in political life to make the descendant nominated for office take the consequences of ancestral delinquencies. Never forgive good Eleazar, of Bible times, because Jehosaphat was one of his forefathers. A candidate has no business to have had a bad grandfather. Bring up the graveyards and array those under the ground against those still above ground. Then marshal all the candidate's early indiscretions and follies and with them from behind the barricade of the ballot box fusillade and bombshell your antagonist. Then come on to the later periods of the candidate's life. Take his utterances and put them into a twisting machine and turn them this way and that, and invert them and disjoint them and decapitate them and caricature them and crucify them. Paint him black from head to foot. Be sure to begin with the blacking-brush at his head and show that he has no brain, no mental qualification, no shrewdness, no acumen, no sound judgment. Then put the blacking-brush on his mouth and show that he cannot make a speech, or, if he does speak, he says the wrong thing. Then come down to his feet and show that he has no feet, putting upon them the responsibility of the wrong deeds of others. Then paint his heart black, showing that he is cruel, mean, arrogant and oppressive to the poor. Then paint his pocket black and show that he is a miser. Then paint his hands black, and much of what he has in that pocket he got dishonestly. Then come on down and paint his knees black, showing that he never prays, or is a bigot and only kneels on his own sectarian footstool. Then come on down and paint his feet black, showing that he has often walked in forbidden places and that he has often slipped in morals. Then paint his house black, as often in years past both candidates for Mayor's or gubernatorial chairs were by infamous doggerel and caricature and campaign song, assailed for their home life. Then, having worn out the blacking brush on the opposing candidate, get a load of lime, dump it at the feet of your favorite candidate, slack it and stir it, and then take your whitewash brush in hand, whitewash him from head to foot, cover up all his defects, make him wise, eloquent, patriotic, efficient. Let us lie as much in favor of the man whom you like as you lie against the man whom you dislike. Talking to temperance people, make him out the eternal friend of sobriety, and talking to the beer-loving population, make him vehement against sumptuary enactment. Say to those who are in favor of unrestrained immigration that he is in favor of foreigners, and to those who are opposed to immigration that he cannot bear an Irishman. When you are near the line between North and South represent him as believing the war is over and there ought to be no more sectional strife, but up further toward the north star, represent him as in paroxysm of indignation because General Longstreet's hand was kissed by his old soldiers in Georgia. Have your candidate on a pivot so you can turn him around this way and that, like Mrs. Jarley's wax figures. "Now, fellow-citizens, take my candidate or suffer the consequences. With him, prosperity, good government, less taxes, reform in all departments. Reject him, and misrule, depleted treasury, poor wages, bankruptcy and ruin."

Now, having given three times three for the solid ticket, we adjourn for the polls. Have near the polls two or three saloons with free drinks. If it be against the law to have the front door open on Election Day, have the back door unlocked; or, if that be also watched, have some private house where we can all go for refreshments. You cannot expect a man to stand out from morning until night on a cold November day without some kind of physical reinforcement. Go out and meet people as they come to the polls and give them your package of tickets. If they are prepared with another kind of bait, persuade them of their folly and beseech them by all they hold dear to pause before they throw the city or the country into disasters from which it will never recover. If you are at the head of a factory or large commercial establishment, tell your employees you do not want to interfere with their political sentiment, that you never have used and never will use your influence as an employer to decide what your employees shall do; but get a spy among your men to report to you how his comrades vote, and after awhile, during the course of the year, let those who voted a different ticket from that which you preferred drop out of their places not knowing what hurt them. If it is a close election, fix up the returns. Do not for so paltry a thing as 200 or 300 votes let the wrong Sheriff, or Mayor, or President be elected. Yes, that reminds me, I made a mistake in one of those returns and I put the figure three where it ought to have been the figure six. Hurry up to headquarters with that correction. A few hours ago it seemed as if we were about 150 votes short, but now by this correction we are about 150 ahead. Huzza! the cause is safe. Kindle the tar barrels all up and down the street. Long live the dear people! That is one style of election and it is very popular, and there will be thousands of that kind this Autumn.

Temptation of Applause.

THE approval of the world is destructive. It is right that we should want to be thought well of. God says a good name is better than precious ointment. It is an immense power for good. Always be on the right side, ready to speak or to act for the cause of God, and one's country gives one a reputation that is fit to be the ambition of any man. But he who lives for the approval and applause of the world is already under a destructive process. There are thousands who have gone down under it. Across holocausts of the dead, men have fought their way just to add one star more to their shoulder-straps. Beauty, genius, everything that men and women have, have been sacrificed for this; and it has generally been the case that in proportion as they went up in fame, they went down in character. Some of them took to their cups. Some floundered in political dishonesties. Some stood in the high places of the earth, or sat in presidential chairs, displaying a stubbornness and spite, the laughing-stock of all nations. Byron wrote that he felt more pain from the criticism of the most ignorant man than he felt joy from the praises of all intelligent men. The same admirers that applauded Sheridan's wit, wrangled over Sheridan's coffin. Dryden was kept from being buried several days after he ought to have been buried, because the roughs howled and howled and quarrelled about his dead body. Burns, after being spoiled of popular caresses, is flung into an inebriate's grave. And the devil now takes a man up to the top of the temple, and shows him the kingdoms of the world and the glories of them, and then pushes him off the pinnacle. The world slew, by its flatteries, Charles Mathews, and De Quincy, and Campbell, and Aaron Burr, and Pierpont Edwards; and it has paved Westminster Abbey and the Congressional burying ground with the hollow skulls in which genius and art and eloquence once lived.

Why?

THE question we ask every day and never get successfully answered is, why so many good people are taken away, and so many useless people live on? Let us postpone the mystery to the day when we shall find out why John Somerfield, the flaming evangel, expired at twenty-seven years of age, just as his grandest work seemed opening before him, and why John McClintock died before he had completed his cyclopædia of biblical, theological, and ecclesiastical literature, and until the day when we shall know why in the fifty-seventh year of his age, William Morley Punshon closed his lips forever, while on his shoulder rested the interests of the English Missionary Society, and there were yet so many words of fire waiting for him to speak. Yea, until that day when we shall find why Beethoven was struck with complete deafness so that he could not hear the loudest organ crash rendering his own music, and that day when we shall find out why so many authors never finished their manuscripts, and why so many artists dropped their pencils just as they were making the outline of a great masterpiece, and why so many poets stopped midway the rhythm, and why so many bright days halted at noon.

Revenge.

A MOST dangerous feeling of the heart is the spirit of retaliation. Stamp out this spark of a sulphurous match before the entire temple of your nature is wrapped in the conflagration. Take no revenge by stiletto, or carbine, or critic's pen, or printer's type, or Frenchman's shrug, or tattler's tongue, or innuendo. Revenge is a knife without any handle. It cuts you as you clutch it, long before it stabs him. With all our boasted Christianity, we ought to have as much moral equipoise as did Pericles the heathen. He was one day berated in the most outrageous way, and in such a hot passion that the scold did not notice it was getting dark, and when the fusillade was over, Pericles said to his servant, "Bring a lamp now, and light him home." The spirit of the Gospel in the heart of a man who had never heard the Gospel.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Estimated Expenditure of the Church Missionary Society for the fiscal year just commenced is $1,540,000. Last year the expenditure exceeded the income by $133,000. It never has sufficient faith to send out seventy new missionaries this fall.

There are Few Countries in which the Society receive greater facilities for their work than Russia, and the London committee have sent the Czar with a beautiful copy of the which he has accepted in a grateful letter.

The annual report of the Maine Bible Society shows that ninety-five towns in the State place of worship, that of 25,000 families visited last year, 10,000 are outside Christian influence. The Society has distributed 5,400 copies of the Scriptures.

Dr. George F. Pentecost Received a welcome from his London church on his return New York. The sermons he preached stay here, in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian have been published in book form by Messrs. Silver & Co., under the title of "Grace Abounding."

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions reports a falling off of income. In the year in April next clear of debt the Board need $533,000. Last year $750,000 were received during the corresponding period, so that there be an advance of $217,000 in order to meet all needs.

Major Whittle has been holding meetings in Perth, Scotland. Considerable has been aroused, and some have professions for Christ. Mr. Whittle, who expects to have the assistance of Mr. and Mrs. Stoddard, probably evangelize in different Scottish cities the next three months.

Rev. Max Magil, a Young Christian, who has had a wide experience in evangelistic work, would be glad of engagements to preach in various parts of the country. He preaches in English, German or Yiddish. Rev. Herman Wiak, who has been assisting in his New York, cordially recommends him.

Christian Endeavor is flourishing in university city of Oxford, England, which has in its vicinity fifteen societies. The secretary of the British Christian Endeavor Council, "give promise coming the Protestant bulwark, against Romanism and high Anglicanism will beat."

Fulton St. Daily Noon Prayer Meeting celebrated its thirty-ninth anniversary on Sunday. Rev. J. B. Calvert, D.D., presided. Mr. Chas. C. Cutter, who succeeded Mr. C. C. Langford in charge of the meeting, made an address on the course of which he said that during the past year over twenty-one thousand requests for prayer had been received.

The Christian Endeavor Societies in the city of London have won a victory in the cause of the observance of the Lord's Day. Their united protest against the Sunday opening of the Exhibitions of the Coast Fair Association was taken into consideration, and the Association has announced its intention to defer the opening of the fair to a date when it will be necessary to learn three or four months in order to give them the Gospel.

Rev. C. J. Dodds has Arrived at his home at Yukon in the Congo. It is near Stanley, the heart of Central Africa. He writes that he is much impressed with the opportunities for work which present themselves; there is a population of 1,000,000 within a radius of eight miles. It will be necessary to learn three or four months in order to give them the Gospel.

According to the Latest Report of the Methodist Church of Canada, it has 1,257 churches in active circuit and mission work, 10,000 ordained and supernumerary ministers, and 100,000 laymen and women. There are twenty ministers left without appointment, and there are 207 probationers. The total of ministers and probationers is 2,511, showing a decrease in the past year of seven.

The New Class Just Forming in Connecticut with the well-known Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle has taken the name of the Twentieth Century Class. In view of the fact that the last C. L. S. C. to graduate in the past year was the last C. L. S. C. to graduate in the past year. The vigor of this great organization is shown by the fact that last year there were 1,000 new members, which is an evidence of the life which it has upon American life. The Circle undoubtedly has done more to stimulate mental activity than any other agency of our times, except the common schools.

The Annual Report of the London Missionary Society, just issued, shows that the income for the fiscal year just closed was $1,540,000, of which $1,300,000 was raised at the Mission Station. India and China are its principal spheres of labor, also Madagascar, Southern Africa, Polynesia, and Southwestern New Guinea. The Society's European missionaries are 1,000, and its native Christians are 1,000,000. The latter does not include the native Christians in Madagascar, of whom, prior to the usurpation, there were 100,000.

At a Recent Trial in Calcutta a Brahmin sued the father of an orphan who he had adopted. The evidence showed that the wife was a young girl and that she was married when seven. The marriage had been arranged by the father's wisdom. She had been treated in the house of her husband, and he had not at the time ordered her to leave her husband. She would not surrender to him. The father was against her husband's representatives of Brahmin at the Conference of Religion did not dwell on the of their faith.

The Christian and Missionary Alliance which Dr. A. B. Simpson is President, held its thirteenth annual convention in New York City. The sessions commenced on Monday. The regular meetings are held in the Tabernacle Church, corner of Fifth and Forty-fourth street, Sunday service, 10:30 A. M. and 7:30 P. M. Among the interesting part in the proceedings are the reports of Dr. Arthur L. Peterson, the Rev. L. B. Roberts, Chicago, and several missionaries from the Congo, Southern Africa, Rev. A. L. Simpson, daily Bible teacher. The annual meeting commenced on Monday, October 7, at 10:30 A. M. and continued until the afternoon and evening of that day.

Nansen's Return.

EUROPEAN mails supplement the details previously given by cable of the cordial welcome given to the great Norwegian explorer, who has succeeded in placing his country's flag ahead of others, on the way to the North Pole. Dr. Nansen made the last part of his voyage on the Fram, the staunch vessel in which he drifted for eighteen months through the polar seas. He left the ship in March, 1895, and with Lieut. Johansen, attempted to make his way to the Pole on the ice. The two intrepid explorers drifted to a point two hundred miles from that attained by Lockwood of the Gly expedition in 1882. Dr. Nansen went forward alone about twelve miles farther, but finding nothing but the same ice ahead, which had exhausted them to a perilous condition of fatigue, they reluctantly turned their faces southward, getting within two hundred and fifty miles of the Pole. A trying march of four miles brought them to Franz Josef Land in August, 1895, where they determined to remain for the winter.

The built-up ice stores, and seal skins and other necessities as accumulations of the winter. Then an attempt was made to go westward to Spitzbergen over the ice pack, but had to be abandoned owing to the thickness of the ice. In the day's march they did not make more than half a mile. Another attempt was made in June. They traveled about three miles and then rested the night on their kayaks over which they set up a tent. Early in the morning the barking of dogs was heard and Dr. Nansen set out to see what it meant, leaving Johansen in charge of the tent. Going in the direction from which the noise of the dogs came, Nansen saw a man approaching him with outstretched hands and heard himself greeted by name. It was Mr. F. C. Jackson, of the Jackson-Hamsworth expedition which is exploring Franz Josef Land. Dr. Nansen and he had last met in London and now to their astonishment met again on an ice floe in the Arctic. They had passed the winter within a few miles of each other, neither being aware of the fact. Jackson sent one of his party to fetch Johansen and in the meantime took a photograph of Nansen. He was a strange looking object. His blond hair and beard had grown long and like his skin and clothing were black with grease and the smoke of the blubber. He was taken into the comfortable quarters of the expedition and for the first time in months enjoyed the luxury of a bath. The two explorers compared notes and found that both had reached the same conclusions as to the conditions existing between them and the Pole. In a short time a vessel arrived from England bringing news and provisions for Mr. Jackson and his Dr. Nansen and Lieut. Johansen sailed for Vardo. While there, Nansen heard that the Fram had made her way out of the ice and had reached Skjervø. He immediately went to greet the companions he had left on board her in the Arctic, seventeen months before. He found them all well and the reunited party sailed homeward on the Fram. So it may be with friends who have passed through the trials and sorrows of life together and have been separated after long companionship in tribulation. At the Second Advent those who have gone before will join those who were left behind and both enter together into their reward.

Then we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. 1. Thess. 4: 17.

Why the Timber Decayed.

Microscopical investigation is said, by a scientific journal, to have revealed the cause of decay in certain pieces of timber. It has been noticed that of two logs cut from the same tree and carved into gate-posts, one may decay much more quickly than the other. It is quite common, too, to see the staves of a barrel which is kept partially full of water, vary in the degree in which they absorb moisture, though they may be of the same kind of wood. One of the staves will be always moist from bottom to top, while another will be quite dry above the level of the water in the barrel. The solution of the puzzle suggested by the journal, based on the driver came to the surface bleeding from a severe cut on the head. A rope was thrown to him by the men on the pier, but he was too dazed and weak to hold it. One of these men ran off to get a boat. Another threw himself face downward on the pier and tried to reach the drowning man, but the tide was low and the water was over twelve feet below the level of the pier. Seeing that the man could not keep afloat many minutes longer and was becoming faint with loss of blood, the would-be rescuer called to a strong man to hold his feet and lower him over the edge of the pier. It was done, but still he could not reach the drowning man. Two other men seeing the urgency of the case seized the second by his feet, and lowered him, too, over the edge, he still clinging firmly to the feet of the first, whose hands now touched the water. Just then the drowning man floated within reach and was grasped by the lowest link of this human chain and his head raised above the surface. He was so held until the men with the boat arrived and safely lifted him in. The rescuers were hauled on the pier looking pretty well tired out by their exertions. The earnest co-operation of these men is an example to Christian workers. Sometimes a soul might be saved from perishing, if the man with love in his heart were aided in reaching the soul by the man who has eloquence, and the man who has money, the three making a living chain of rescuing power.

There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit . . . there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. 1. Cor. 12: 46.

Signals Over Sea.

Preparations are being made by the Signal Corps of the Naval Reserve for a series of experiments with the flash-light in New York. The largest and most powerful flash-light in the world has been constructed and will be placed on the roof of one of the tallest buildings in the city. A war ship is to take its place at a distance of ninety miles from land and an officer of the signal service with a good glass will be on board to read the signals. It is believed that a light so strong as the one prepared will be visible at that distance, although in the day time the shore could not be seen with the unaided eye. Another officer will be on the ship who will take down the time for using such signals in earnest may never come, but we are assured that a time will come when deliverance for the waiting people of God will be heralded by signs in the heavens visible all over the world, bringing hope and joy to those who are watching and have learned to read the signs of the times.

Forasmuch as they which sit in light and in the light of the Son of man be in his day.

Thieves in a Lariat.

A travelling salesman just returned from a journey in Mexico, related a strange experience to the Washington Star. He said that he and another American were obliged to spend a night at a small town some fifty miles from Mexico city. The hotel-keeper, in conducting them to the room they were to occupy, cautioned them to lock the doors, as there had been several robberies lately by half-breeds, who were liable to commit murder if they were resisted. The room was out in the yard, a kind of summer-house affair, with a door on each of its two opposite sides. The doors had locks upon them, but the upper part of the door was like a Venetian shutter, with slats for ventilation. As the travellers had rather a large sum of money with them, they were concerned about the security of the doors. They were not disturbed until the first gray light of dawn, when one of them, hearing a slight noise, rose from his bed and looked at the door. He saw a dirty yellow hand thrust through the shutter and grope around to find the lock. He noiselessly awoke his companion, who examining the other door, found that another thief was at work there. A strong lariat was hanging on the wall and it suggested an idea to the intended victims. They made a running loop at each end and passed a loop around each of the two intruding wrists. Then drawing the lariat tight and knotting it over a beam, both the thieves were held fast. They appeared to guess what had happened to them, for another hand holding a knife was thrust through the lattice, but the rope was out of its reach. They were thus held until the hotel-keeper rose in the morning and found them there and had them arrested. It was a ridiculous predicament to be tied together in that ingenious fashion, neither being able to withdraw without maiming the other. Many evildoers have found themselves so situated when their hands have been free, but they have been bound as securely to their comrades in sin by ties of false honor or affection, as if they had been bound to them by ropes. Such connections have brought ruin to multitudes, who, if they had been free, might have escaped. In many ways has the warning of the wise king been fulfilled:

His own iniquities shall take the wicked and he shall be caught in his own snare.

THE WELCOME OF THE "FRAM."

revelation of the microscope is that the pores of the wood retain the same direction and partially the same power they had in the tree. Thus, if the gate-post is set up in a position the reverse of that it occupied when part of the living tree, the end that in the tree was nearest the root, being the head of the post, the rain falling upon it will circulate through the post, while if it is set in the same position as it occupied in the tree, the rain will not affect it. Just so with the staves of the barrel: the one that is moist to the top is the one that is in its natural position and the pores are conducting the moisture upward as they used to do the sap. This, if true, is a very significant fact, showing that death in a tree does not cause its organs to cease their functions. It may be that there is an analogous law in the human constitution, and that after death, the old habits and propensities may remain, continuing their old ways and involving the bitter consequences. One of the sentences of doom appears to imply this:

He that is unjust let him be unjust still; and he who is filthy let him be filthy still. Rev. 22: 11.

Saved by a Human Chain.

A remarkable rescue of a man from drowning occurred in New York on Sept. 25. He had driven a cart laden with stone to a pier on the East River. The horse suddenly became balky and backed over the edge of the pier into the river. The the signals as the one with the glass sees them and dictates, while a third has the code and deciphers them. The light will be fixed on a stand having a ball-and-socket arrangement which will permit the light to be easily moved in any direction. The code is arranged on a system of numbers, each number having a distinct order indicated by it. A steady light straight out to sea of a certain duration, means that signalling is about to begin and the officers on the ships are to watch it. A swerve to the right indicates number one in the code; to the left number two; and a quick elevation skyward, three. Referring to the code the officers on the ships may learn from the numbers that a telegram has been received that an enemy has appeared off the southern coast and ships are to be sent at once to intercept him. Or, a suspicious looking vessel has been observed off the northern coast, and notice has been sent by telegraph to New York, so that a vessel may be sent to watch it. It is easy to see how useful such a system would be in a time of national peril. The principle has long been in use. As far back as the time of Queen Elizabeth, the fleet which guarded the English coast against the Spanish Armada, received signals by bonfires

200,000 Premiums

Enormous Supplies Required to Meet the Demands of Our Friends — An Interesting and Instructive Time-Table.

On another page of this issue we publish a premium announcement of peculiar interest to most of our readers, and in connection with this offer we would direct attention to an important matter, which, if borne in mind by our subscribers, will contribute largely to their comfort as well as our own.

Many people, after having mailed a letter containing money, become prematurely impatient for a response, and feel considerable disappointment in not receiving their premium at an unduly early date. The trouble generally is that they do not make a sufficient time allowance for their letters to arrive in New York and the goods to reach their hands.

It has happened that orders sent from the Pacific Coast on Monday, and requiring six days to reach New York, were followed the very same week by complaints to the effect that no answer had yet been received to the original communication. This, of course, is unreasonable, and not infrequently have we set a train of elaborate investigation in motion only to ascertain that there was no ground whatever for the complaint, and that had the writer stopped to reflect how much time the round trip must necessarily consume, the complaint would never have been penned.

During the months of October and November we can fill orders invariably within a few hours after they reach our hands, but during the Christmas month, when the holiday rush comes in, we may require a little additional time. We are not conscious of a single instance (except when our supply of some particular premium was exhausted, and we were awaiting new supplies in order to fill belated orders) where we required more than twenty-four hours to forward an order, even though we handled five or ten thousand letters a day at such time.

This year we are determined more than ever to please our many friends, and it will be our aim and object to fill premium orders with the greatest dispatch, and to satisfy every reasonable expectation in point of time. And now to guard against miscalculations that may result in disappointment, we append, for the information of our subscribers, at the foot of this article, a table indicating the time which must of necessity elapse between the mailing of a letter and the delivery of the premium to the subscriber either by express or mail, and if our friends when they order, will kindly bear this table in mind, we are sure that the hundreds of thousands of transactions involved in the extraordinarily heavy Fall and Winter trade which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD enjoys will be handled with uniform satisfaction to all concerned.

Of course, it is always better to order as early as a date as possible. We have found that sometimes the most generous supplies are unexpectedly exhausted by an unusual and wholly unprecedented demand. Last year, for instance, our almost incredibly large stock of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Library vanished so rapidly that it was absolutely impossible (even with the aid of enormous additional supplies), to keep pace with the demand, and as for our Bibles, though fifty thousand orders were originally provided for, it kept two forces working respectively day and night, to meet the requirements.

Now, as to the time which must necessarily elapse between the mailing of an order and the delivery of the premium, we would direct the attention of our readers to the following figures. In the first column are the States from which the orders are supposed to emanate, and the figures opposite them represent the days that it requires for the letters to reach New York, and the goods to reach the subscribers:

Those who order early are always sure of getting what they want and when they want it, while those who are late must, of course, take some chances. This year, whenever requested so to do, we will, at our own expense, telegraph our subscribers when we find it impossible to fill their orders immediately, so that they may make other provision elsewhere, and in every instance of such compulsory disappointment we will, of course, immediately refund the money.

Never before have we ordered larger quantities than this year, and it will interest our readers to know that we have made provision to supply two hundred thousand subscribers with premium selections from stock which is now coming in, and which by the time this reaches our readers will actually be stored in our mammoth warehouse. Our arrangements with the express companies are also more perfect than ever, and will ensure the promptest handling of our goods, and we feel that we can safely promise that no delay at any point will ensue in the filling of any orders entrusted to us.

We have made specially liberal provision for the Thumb Index Bible. An offer like this is simply unprecedented. Thumb indexes command a high price and are in great demand, yet comparatively few people can afford the additional expense involved. The enormous quantity ordered at one time by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD makes it possible for us to offer this beautiful, large type, silk-sewed, red under gold, Divinity circuit Teachers' Bible, leather lined to edge, without any additional expense whatever for the thumb index. We are thoroughly alive to the fact that the demand created by this exceptional opportunity will be unprecedentedly large. We have, therefore, made preparations on a most gigantic scale.

But do not indulge in needless delay. If you feel that you want one of these Teachers' Bibles, order it now, and should your subscription not yet expire for some time to come we will date it a year ahead from your present expiry date. You, thus, lose nothing by anticipating the date. If you cannot now subscribe, or do not care now to subscribe, but want to make sure of one of these Bibles, send us a postal card to that effect, and we will hold one for you. It is an opportunity that should not be missed by any one who has occasion frequently to use the Sacred Word.

There is no Christmas present like one of these Teachers' Bibles, whether it be given to parents or to children; to Sunday School teacher or to superintendent; to pastor or to friend. It is a very welcome, serviceable, useful gift, one that you will never regret having made.

It is very important that our readers bear in mind that all the premiums shipped or mailed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are invariably sent ALL CHARGES PREPAID. While the Express Companies endeavor to do right in every instance, it will sometimes happen that the station agent by mistake collects charges on delivery. In every case of this kind reported to us, the Express Companies will refund the money thus collected.

Of course our friends understand that we can defer delivery of premiums purchased now but intended for Christmas until the proper date. This plan offers two advantages. In the first instance, we relieve our subscribers of all the care, worry and expense connected with delivery, and secondly, it insures them against the possibility of disappointment. Waiting until Christmas may prove deferring things until it is too late, but ordering goods in October, and giving December as the date of shipment, is a sure guarantee of getting what you want and when you want it.

While we always pack our premiums in a manner to ensure their safe and undamaged delivery, we cheerfully make good any damage they may accidentally meet with while in transit.

If for any reason, our 1897 Bibles should fail to give entire satisfaction, we will, on their return, and without asking for any explanation, gladly, cheerfully, and promptly refund the full amount involved.

Interesting Data.

Very few of our friends can have any intelligent conception of the magnitude of our premium transactions. It will no doubt surprise them to learn that within the year ending October 1st, nearly 1,000,000 volumes were required to supply the premium demands of our subscribers.

During the month of December last, the express charges on premiums shipped in the twenty-six working days of that month exceeded the enormous sum of $26,000, or an average of one thousand dollars a day. We believe that there is not another concern in the United States or in the entire world which does a larger express shipping business.

Over 235,000,000 pages of wholesome literature were distributed last year in connection with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD premium offers, and in addition to this, there were 90,000,000 pages of the Sacred Word, making the enormous total of 325,000,000 pages. The weight of this vast mass of material exceeded 400 tons.

Long before our readers took their Thanksgiving dinner last year, arrangements had been perfected with authors, paper-makers, printers, binders, cloth-manufacturers, and box-makers in various parts of this country for the production of the premiums which are this year intended to gladden the hearts of nearly 200,000 subscribers.

The magnificent Bible, with its wonderful thumb index, its soft, flexible binding, its beautiful red under gold edges, its clear open print, is one of the results of their industry and ingenuity, and no Bible superior to this has ever been offered.

It affords us intense gratification to be permitted this week to present a premium proposition so remarkable, so attractive and of such intrinsic merit and worth as this. We now believe that we have reached a point where improvement, at the price involved, is outside the range of possibility, and that we never, even under the most favorable circumstances, will be in position to offer the subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a better Bible, a more beautiful Bible, or a more complete Bible, than the one more fully described on the following page.

The number of letters received at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office during Christmas month frequently exceeded 10,000 a day, and the number of separate packages forwarded in the twenty-six working days of the same month was about 110,000, running from 2,700 to 8,000 a day. It is needless to say that it requires a small army of packers and shipping clerks to satisfactorily handle this enormous volume of business.

During the week preceding Christmas, for the accommodation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its friends, some of the Express Companies worked uninterruptedly day and night in order that the packages intended for holiday gifts might reach on time; but, unfortunately, some orders came either altogether too late to permit return shipments to be made on time, or after our premium stock was exhausted. But we are happy to say that the number of disappointments were few and far between, and very insignificant when compared with the whole number of transactions involved.

It is safe to say that we have received literally tens of thousands of letters from our subscribers expressing the greatest satisfaction with the character of our premiums and the promptness with which their orders were handled.

Europe and Abdul Hamid.

The Attitude of England, Germany, France, and Russia Defined—An Era of Shame.

WHAT shall be done with the Sultan? is at this moment the great overshadowing question that perplexes all the European governments. Some idea of the attitude of the different governments and nations on this vexed question may be gathered from the facts published below:

The French newspapers have displayed a lamentable apathy with regard to the Armenian question. In the leading French journals, the Sultan is credited with a desire to "improve the position of his people and especially of the Armenians." The French newspapers, in fact, have been prostrate at Abdul Hamid's feet. They profess to doubt the genuineness of the agitation in England, one writer remarking that "the friends of Armenia have positively made the position worse and prolonged the misery they had meant to relieve."

In Germany, the agitation is gradually growing in opposition to the Armenian policy of the Sultan, but official influence prevents its free expression in the press. Gladstone's Anti-Turkish speech has excited much opposition among certain portions of the German press. The Vossische Zeitung, however, expresses the hope that the words of the former Prime Minister of Great Britain will have a sobering effect upon the Sultan and the palace clique behind him. At the same time it thinks Gladstone may reawaken the fanaticism of the Moslems and the Armenian revolutionists and their followers, leading to the very results which he so strongly deprecates. The North German Gazette attacks Gladstone viciously. German papers are stung by the taunts of Russian journals, which ask why Germany now shows itself averted before the phantasm of war, as a consequence of an attempt to coerce the Sultan.

Feeling in England runs higher daily and the climax must soon be reached. Especially is the pulpit fervid in its denunciation of the Sultan. Canon Rawnsey of Carlisle, who may be quoted as a sample of many other noted preachers, in a late sermon, used this thrilling language:

"At last Christian England has this chance of preaching to Turk and Armenian alike the Gospel of a living faith and a living God, and fervent charity to all men. Out of the deeps of agony insupportable Armenia calls and calls, and this in more senses than the captive. Do you know that two months since a diver went down to his work in the Bosphorus, and found himself suddenly in the presence of what seemed an army of men standing upright in the swaying tide? There they stood with lead weights at their feet and heavy stones tied around their ankles, but they were an army of dead men all. He counted forty from where he stood; this was but a detachment of the hundreds of poor Armenians who had secretly been caught in Constantinople and cast into the deeps, none heeding but God alone. Can we wonder that many divers in the past few months have struck work in the Bosphorus? Do you know that eight weeks ago three hundred men were spirited aboard an old vessel, and were cast out at the dead of night into mid-tide-way, and was no more heard of? There are three hundred more dead men standing up upon their feet, an exceeding great and mighty army in the deeps."

"These martyred people, for they died for Christ, call unto us from their deeps of death to move England and Christian Europe to her deeps of life and compassion; and still their voice goes up unto God clear over the sounding sea, and still of each poor murdered man in that melancholy tide it is true in the words of the psalmist, 'Out of the deeps have I called unto Thee, Lord, hear my voice. Oh, let thine ears consider well the voice of

Some incidents of the recent troubles, not hitherto published, are almost incredible. The captain of a French steamer which conveyed some refugees to Marseilles, gave a realistic account of what he had witnessed. He saw an old white-headed Softa installed inside a door looking on to the balcony of a minaret. The Softa was amusing himself shooting at Armenians on a roof. As soon as he brought down one or two, Turkish policemen rushed up to the roof and completed the slaughter by stabbing the men with knives or crushing their heads with their boots. The captain raised the French flag over Armenians whom the Turks endeavored to kill on the gangway of his ship, and the murderers turned scowling away. An American negro sailor and two Italians saved the lives of fifteen Armenian porters who took refuge in a house. They placed themselves at the door and beat off the cowardly mob. One correspondent compares the massacre to "a great rat hunt." Boys of ten and gray-beards of seventy joined with equal eagerness in the sport. An Armenian postman of the British post-office was beaten to death before the office door. While the massacre was going on, the Sultan enjoyed a little duck-shooting in the Palace grounds, and spent a pleasant evening in the Palace theatre. The only thing that has troubled him is the fact that the Ambassadors did not illuminate their residences as usual on his accession day. That "deeply moved him."

Gospel Growth in Laos.

Missionaries Tell of Wonderful Conquests For Christ in that Distant Land.

IN an article published in this journal a few weeks ago, much interesting information, from missionary sources, was given concerning medical mission work in the Laos country, which borders on the north of the kingdom of Siam. There is an interesting social and religious side to the Laos people that well repays study. Rev. Jonathan Wilson of Lakawn, a missionary of the Presbyterian Board, tells about the work of preparing and printing a Laos Hymnal, and of its cordial welcome by the people. This touching incident forever fixed in his memory one of the hymns chosen for translation:

"For two days and nights we had been anxiously watching for the life of a babe, dangerously ill. Symptoms for the better had, we hoped, appeared. Pain gave place to a night of restful sleep. In the early morn, the hymn, 'Come, ye Disconsolate, Where'er Ye Languish,' was rendered in Laos. Our first sight of the sick babe suggested new hopes of recovery. But a sudden change came and two hours afterward it died in its mother's arms. We prepared the body for its cradle-coffin. It rested among fragrant flowers, and as we

All foreign ships leaving Constantinople are crowded with Armenian refugees. The men who captured the Ottoman Bank and compelled the Sultan to grant their lives, and give them free exit from the country, were conveyed to Marseilles, where they were lodged by the French police in jail.

THE SOULS OF THE CHILDREN.

"'HO bids for the little children—
Body, and soul, and brain?
Who bids for the little children—
Young, and without a stain?
"Will no one bid?" said the nation,
"For their souls, so pure and white,
And fit for all good and evil,
The world on their page may write?"
"We bid," said Pest and Famine,
"We bid for life and limb;
For food and pain, and sorrow,
For the young, young, eyes shall dim.
When the children grow too many,
We'll nurse them as our own,
And hide them in secret places,
Where none may hear their moan."

Said Crime, "Ye rich, ye wise,
And let the busy world spin round,
While you, who would not take a cross,
And your judges shall have work,
And your lawyers wag the tongue,
And the children shall be lost."

"Oh! shame," said true Religion,
"I'll take the little children—
Oh! give them all to me!
I'll raise them all in kindness,
I'll teach them words of blessing,
And lead them up to God."

sat near it, this newly written hymn was repeated to the weeping mother. Her tears were hushed. In way of repetition the hymn was sung to her. It was sung again in the early evening of the funeral service. Often as I may hear this Laos hymn sung, I shall think of the little babe that went to sleep in its mother's arms, and the comfort that the hymn seemed to give her."

Since its opening in 1867, the growth of the Laos Mission of the Presbyterian church has been steady and encouraging. Seven years ago there were four churches, ten elders, and 241 church members in the Laos Mission. Now there are 11 churches, 36 elders, and 1,841 communicating church members. The latest statistics show ordained missionaries, 8; missionary physicians, 5; wives of missionaries, 11; single lady missionaries, 5; ordained native evangelists, 2; native helpers, 57; churches, 11. In many parts of the country, the work of the missionary is done by visiting the scattered villages. A sample day's work is recorded by Rev. Robert Irwin, stationed at Lampoon:

"I made a tour of the villages of the South part of the mission. I was invited from all the villages to go and to spend the day. We started at 7 o'clock, and went to the village of... The teachers and all the Christians who knew a little bit were pressed into service, taking a class or two. The work was very interesting. After dinner the Christians met for prayer and the singing of the hymns. The work of the missionaries in Laos and those in Siam are brought into friendly contact in the Gospel field, owing to the proximity of their stations, and the meeting is a pleasant one and the work goes on with increased fervor. There is a great desire for education among the Laos and books are in eager demand. The are, if anything, better pupils than the Siamese, being of more vigorous physique, thrifty, industrious, and with fairly good normal stamina. Another advantage is that the Laos are not ruled, like Siam, by the Buddhist priests, but though nominally Buddhists, are really spirit-worshippers and their cruder belief makes them more ready to accept the teachings of the Gospel.

An annual event of great importance in Laos is the Festival of Lampang-kung, which is held in the largest temple in the land, that of the Governor at Lakawn. This event is interestingly described by Dr. J. S. Thomas stationed at Lakawn. "The temple is built on a high hill which is completely taken in by the temple wall. In the centre is an immense pagoda of brass, terminating in a lofty spire at the top of which are said to be many valuable and precious stones. The pagoda is covered with many layers of gold leaf, the accumulation of centuries. We saw many people going up this pagoda by ladders, 150 feet, and putting this leaf on it, this was merit-making. Around this huge and beautiful structure are erected many temple buildings, containing innumerable idols, before which priests and people were constantly prostrating themselves. Then around and outside these buildings was a complete line of sheds, in which the people could sleep, and where they had their waiting offerings. An outside of all this was the temple wall. The approaches to the wall on two sides were brick work and solid masonry, made into long, curved, but easy stairways. Outside the wall were the houses of the princes, the common sala of the people, and on this occasion our tents. The people from all the villages bring in to the respective princes their offerings. The people enter the verandah and prostrate themselves before the prince who asks the name of each village, and pronounces his benediction upon it, the people and their offerings. The offerings are given by and prepared by the common people, and the princes make the merit.

Saturday afternoon was the climax of the festival. The princes were in all their gorgeousness, with their huge gold betel boxes, some worth $1,000, and still more huge cuspidors, and their hundreds of costumed attendants, while back of them were many priests from the other temples, their wives and attendants, and still further back the whole temple ground was literally covered with people, with their heads covered with flowers, and their bodies with scraps of a colors. There were thousands of people. The governor and all the attending prince held flowers and lighted candles in their hands, in the attitude of prayer, while the priests were chanting their incantation and calling on their gods. This part of the ceremony was impressive. The governor was then giving two ponies, ten slave (who would now become temple slaves these were dressed in white), and many other gifts.

Then came the more common gifts which in turn also touched the pagoda and then began a desecrating performance. Scores and hundreds would rush in from the crowd, and there occurred a scrambling and grabbing which was terrible—men wild with determination to get some thing—while later on it was heathenish to see the little children grab the pieces of cooked rice and vegetables, and crowd them into their bags—betel, tobacco and all. If a short part of the ceremony seemed solemn, the rest of it was the reverse."

The faithful missionaries held Gospel services on the temple grounds and told the story of the Cross to large native audiences.

ITS DEBT LIQUIDATED.

The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church, through its general secretary, Rev. Dr. William S. Lansing, has been discharging, and that discharging, a debt of $100,000, which has been accumulated over a period of years. Aug. 20, 1896, finds the society with a small amount to the credit of the society.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

Chinese Gardeners.

Hung Chang's Countrymen in California
—A Colony of Caterers.

CALIFORNIA, ever since the earliest days of Chinese immigration, has had a larger number of Celestials within its borders than any other State of the Union. They are scattered widely rough the State, but in San Francisco, they are as thick as bees in a hive, and occupy the very heart of the city. They are presented in many different industries, but probably none is more familiar than that shown in the photographic illustration on this page. Chinamen are exceedingly industrious, and as Li Hung Chang, their distinguished countryman, recently remarked, they are generally successful because of their industry and thrift. Truck-gardening and fishing keep many Chinamen busily engaged in San Francisco, and with their queer-looking baskets, sometimes containing several hundred pounds weight, they are daily visitors in the residential part of the city, where they dispose of their fish and vegetables. The bay is full of fish of many kinds, crabs, smelts, bass, eels, cod-fish, and other varieties—and sometimes dozens of different kinds of fish, all of which are heaped together in a basket, a squirming, wriggling mass. At one time, the Celestials used dynamite in fishing, but the danger was so great that the employment of the explosive was prohibited, and now they use net and line in the bay, which extends for miles and is probably one of the finest fishing-grounds in the world. Occasionally, a pelican may be seen swooping down upon the fishers and rising with a live fish in its mouth. But even these aerial divers are not more expert than the Chinese anglers.

To a large extent, Chinese have persuaded white men in the traffic of fish and vegetables in the coast cities of the Golden State. Many families employ Chinese cooks (one is shown in the photograph), and they, of course, prefer to patronize their own countrymen. There are from all between twenty thousand and twenty-five thousand Chinese in San Francisco, hence Chinatown—the locality where they live together—is in itself sufficiently populous for a fair-sized city. It is an odd agglomeration of small stores, eating-houses, and rows upon rows of dwellings without window-curtains, signs or signboards, and with the bare walls barred across. The stores and restaurants are lavish in their display of scrolls of red paper, with Chinese characters printed in black, and at night many of these business places are illuminated with their lanterns. Two-thirds of the stores sell meat, fruit, or grocery stalls. There are bundles of sugar cane from the Sandwich Islands; watermelons, pork, poultry; smoked fowl, tame and wild; dried and smoked fish from China; tubs full of rice, boiled rice; cakes with Chinese characters, and in which one finds a queer mixture of rice, watermelon seeds, bacon, hazel nuts; fishing-rods, Chinese slippers, wooden shoes, etc. Mongolian men, women, and children, all in their native costume, move about in this strange quarter in crowds, and travelers who have been in China declare that with the exception of the architecture of the locality, the scene is an exact reproduction of what goes on daily in Canton or Peking.

The little Chinese children of both sexes are dressed in gaudy green or blue costumes, and their little round faces with bright eyes and healthy complexions, are a pleasant sight.

Unfortunately, the morals of Chinatown are of a very low order, and had Li Hung Chang visited it, he would doubtless have found much to criticize with disapproval. Gambling, opium-smoking, and other forms of debauchery and vice are everywhere prevalent. The vice of Chinatown has done much toward fixing the popular idea of the Chinese in America, perhaps unfairly, but, nevertheless, not without some foundation. There are, however, many bright exceptions where Chinamen who have come under civilizing and Christianizing influence through mission work have abandoned their heathen belief and the peculiar vices that are its accompaniment.

Social Life in Athens.

In a letter from Athens, describing life in the Greek Capital, Rev. J. B. Risk gives this glimpse of the most moral city in Europe: "Athens is, I think, without doubt, the most moral city in the world. There are no open and visible solicitations to vice.

CHINESE FISH AND VEGETABLE SELLER, IN SAN FRANCISCO.

The modern Greeks have still the same characteristics of the ancient race—a regard for measure and moderation which is truly wonderful. The people seem to have no violent passions; they are, as they say themselves, 'philosophic.' They do not cherish hatred or revenge. Modern Athens is full of interest, and the aspect of life it presents is highly picturesque. Here one sees well-dressed men and women elegantly attired according to the latest Parisian fashion, jostling with the villager in his Albanian costume, or with the rude mountaineer in his capote and sheepskin. And in every detail of daily life the same contrast is observable—the new civilization displacing the older, which still clings to its skirts." Athens is certainly a charming city to live in, and Americans who have visited it are enthusiastic over its beautiful scenery and excellent society.

A Wilful Princess.

In one of the leading English magazines an interesting and instructive anecdote is related of Queen Victoria, as illustrating how her children were brought up. The children, except the eldest, (afterward Empress Frederick, mother of the German Emperor), are said to have obeyed their parents implicitly. The Prince Consort, her father, had a physician in attendance named Brown, and as is the fashion with persons in his position, addressed the doctor merely by his surname, Brown, omitting any title or prefix. The royal children took up the form of address, and were promptly reproofed. The younger ones became more respectful, but the princess royal continued to call the doctor Brown. She was told that if she repeated the offense she would be sent to bed. The next morning as the doctor entered the breakfast room, she rose and said, "Good morning, Brown;" then seeing the Queen's eye fixed sternly upon her, she added, "And good night, Brown, for I'm going to bed," and without waiting for orders, marched off to her room. She stayed there until the full measure of her punishment was fulfilled.

Sharing Childish Pleasures.

We should be careful how we repress childish enthusiasm over discoveries that seem to us to be unimportant, but which, to the child, so new to everything here, are of absorbing interest. When there is no sympathy with child life, no stooping of the larger to the lesser mind to take in

EVENING HYMN.

THE day is past and over:
All thanks, O Lord, to thee!
I pray thee now, that sinless
The hours of dark may be.
O Jesus, keep me in thy sight,
And save me through the coming night!
The joys of day are over:
I lift my heart to thee;
And ask thee that offenceless
The hours of dark may be.
O Jesus, make their darkness light,
And save me through the coming night!
The toils of day are over:
I raise the hymn to thee;
And ask that free from peril
The hours of dark may be.
O Jesus, keep me in thy sight,
And guard me through the coming night!

Mothers and Daughters.

IT is sometimes painful to observe the lack of sympathy between the daughters of to-day and the poor mothers, who may be old-fashioned and out-of-date. On this subject, Mary Lowe Dickinson, addressing the daughters, writes as follows: Do not think, because your mother never had any special cultivation in music, and knows nothing of it scientifically, that she will not be interested and pleased if you, in your little musical parties and gatherings, always see that she has a place, and that not the place of the chaperon, to be neglected, but of the companion, who will try to understand what you appreciate, that she may enjoy what you enjoy. In your conversation at home and around the table, do not keep strictly to the topics with which you think she is familiar, and so show her no other range but that of household life, but try her on the new subjects, tell her the new ideas that you hear advanced by other people. Speak to her on topics of general interest. Tell her what you have been reading, and get her to tell you what she thinks, at the same time that you frankly share your thoughts with her. It is natural for the mothers to feel it much when the girls and the boys go away to school or college, and they find at vacation time that everything is changed. The new things that are filling the minds of the students are not talked of in the homes. Between the mother and daughter, or mother and son, is a great gulf fixed. The young people know the change but dispose of it by saying, "Mother doesn't care for those things." Of how much mother would care if only they gave her a chance, they are, perhaps, incapable of judging. Certainly, in the two matters of dress and conversation, and, in many cases, in the books and the higher intellectual life, the mother might share if only the child were not too eager to be with younger friends and too indifferent as to whether the mother moves by her side or not.

Bismarck's Love of Frolic.

Old as he is, the great German ex-Chancellor is still fond of amusement, but he is now too decrepit to join in the merry-makings as he was once wont to do. An acquaintance of Bismarck tells this incident which occurred some years ago in the royal palace at Berlin: It seems one day considerable noise issued from an apartment used by the young princes. Bismarck, who was passing by, put his head within the door and found the young princes dancing and shouting to the tunes of a barrel-organ played by the crown prince. The moment they saw him they invited him to have some fun, too. Bismarck declined, but agreed to play the organ. Right merrily went the fun, and right lively Bismarck ground away, when into the midst of the shouting, laughing, dancing group stalked the Kaiser. A smile swept over his face when he saw that great statesman, Bismarck, the man of iron, grinding away on a barrel-organ, and after greeting his sons, he turned to him in mock displeasure and remarked: "You are beginning in good time to make the heir apparent dance to your music. It seems that this is about the fourth generation that has done so."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Yes.

Rosa R., Ida Grove, Ia. 1. Can you tell me whether there is anything which could take the place of alcohol in making medicines and drugs? 2. In what position should I sleep? 3. I think it would purchase a good book, in a good binding, and start it out in the world, with written instructions to pass it on. The book should be interesting and of good moral tone. Any of T. S. S. would do.

1. Not yet discovered. We understand, however, that there are hospitals (in England and in the United States), where alcohol is not used in compounding drugs or otherwise. 2. On the right side, preferably. 3. The idea is a good one. Why not try it?

Mary S., Wyndmere, N. D. 1. How can you justify other purpose, when you claim as in a recent number that even an untruth, or the least deception, is justified in making a feigned attack on an enemy's right, and so distract their attention, while he employed his main force to turn the enemy's left?

1. War is at all times an evil, but sometimes a necessary one. There may be causes which make it justifiable, as when it is waged in defence of life, honor, and liberty, or against oppressors, invaders of our homes, or despoilers of our firesides. Wars of ambition, aggression, conquest, fanaticism, or of religious hate are utterly unjustifiable. War for the protection of the Armenians need not be based on either untruth or deception. 2. Such a movement as you have described is a part of the art of war which is open to all nations alike. Tactics and strategy as a whole are designed to baffle and deceive. But as we have already shown, war is an evil throughout, and nothing in it will bear rigid moral analysis, although some wars are defensible and even righteous, by comparison with others.

J. M., Davenport, Ia. What is the exact meaning of "cloture," which I see "Cloture" (or "closure") is from a French word, signifying the closing of a thing, and in parliamentary language it means the closing of a debate. It is the custom in the French, Spanish, Italian, Belgian, Norwegian, and Swedish Parliaments to call for a division, when the subject has been sufficiently discussed, notwithstanding the fact that a small majority may object and wish to continue the debate. This custom was introduced in the English Parliament in 1883 to guard against prolonged discussion.

J. M. C., West Union, S. C. 1. Were there any Sadducees in the Jewish Sanhedrim? 2. Have the three men who started from Spitzbergen to explore the North Pole been heard of since they started?

1. There were certainly Sadducees in the Sanhedrim at the time of Paul's trial (see Acts 23:6), as he took advantage of their presence to excite dissension and party spirit between them and the Pharisees. 2. Yes; it is understood that the project has been postponed until next season.

A. M., Our. 1. What would be the duty on the complete set of Encyclopedias to Canada? 2. When Moses was blessing the twelve tribes, did he not state in receiving a blessing also? What had they done?

1. Six cents per pound, or about $2 for the set. 2. The non-appearance of Simeon's name in the blessing of Moses is explained by the circumstance that the tribe was not regarded as having an independent existence. Originally, it had no separate allotment of territory, but only a series of cities, and it was finally dispersed, owing, probably, to some corrupting or sinful elements in the tribe itself

Reader, Ottawa, Ill. Do you think it is right for a Christian to save up money and accumulate treasures on earth, but in heaven? Don't you think that a man should give up his earthly treasures and use them for the service of God? I have given up my income to the Lord and I found such

The true course for a Christian is, not to scorn wealth, but to regard it as a stewardship—a means placed at his disposal, to be employed to best advantage for the glory of God and the benefit of mankind. There is no divine injunction against worldly prosperity; on the contrary it is frequently spoken as a blessing. (See Gen. 13: 1; 1 Sam. 2: 7; Prov. 10: 22; 1 Chron. 29: 12; Psalm 112: 3; Prov. 22: 4; Job 42: 12, and a multitude of passages.) But we are warned against setting our hearts on worldly wealth and against riches that come by dishonest means; also against the improper use of wealth, and against hoarding, usury, extortion, covetousness, greed, miserliness. If we use our wealth for the Lord it will be multiplied and increased (see Prov. 11: 24, etc., etc.), but employed for any other purpose it will be diminished. (See Matt. 19: 23; Mark 10: 23; Luke 9: 24; Jas. 5: 1, and others.) God's work has to be done by the use of money, and we should take pleasure in cheerfully giving that work a fair proportion of our substance, feeling secure in his promise to care for us. The larger our means the greater our responsibility and the more he expects us to do.

Right giving is a great developer of spirituality and brings joy and blessing into our lives.

Mrs. M. N., Hudson, N. Y. Is it the spirit of true worship, or the desire for professional show, that prompts a church to have professional vocalists for its choir?

The service of praise should be as truly an expression of adoration and gratitude as the prayers. A leading divine has written on this point: "The utterances of the finest singer are an offence to God if they be not the vocal expression of heart worship."

S. H., Reed City, Mich. Will there be preaching in Hell? Do you think it possible that any lost soul might, by repentance, or in any other way, escape from perdition and gain an entrance into heaven?

We have no warrant in the Bible for entertaining the hope. If, in the infinite mercy of God, there is a provision made for the ultimate salvation of the lost, it does not appear to us that he has revealed it. It was not essential that he should do so. He has made it clear how men in this life may obtain salvation, and if any one rejects it or neglects it, he has no ground for hoping that he will have another opportunity beyond the grave. It would be an appalling risk for a man to make the experiment.

Inquirer, Providence, R. I. If, as you said in a recent answer to a correspondent, we should make our prayers with the proviso that they are in accordance with God's will, why should we pray at all? Will not God's will be done whether we pray or not?

His will is not done in us without our consent. It is necessary to pray that we may do his will and submit ourselves to it. Back of that, is the desire that our hearts may be attuned to his will, and it is necessary that we pray for that. When we are so in accord with him, that our desires are such as he takes pleasure in granting, we may ask what we will, with assurance that we shall receive it. But even then we must limit our desires with tiently, knowing that he has brought upon himself, but that does not preclude him from using all proper means and remedies for his relief. A more rational view of the government than you appear to have is that God has established natural laws which work their own penalty on transgressors. It is as if a mother strictly forbade her child to touch the pretty red metal of the hot stove. When the child disobeys and lays his hand on the hot metal, there is no occasion for the father to punish him for his disobedience. He fears from his burns, and she does her best to give him relief. God does not delight in our sinning, but it pleases him when we learn to avoid the sin which caused it.

Subscriber, Jersey City, N. J. Is it known to inhabitants of Europe are divided as to whether they are Roman Catholics or Protestants?

The latest statistics we have seen give the population of Europe as about three hundred and fifty millions. Of these, the Roman Catholic Church claims 105,000,000, but probably many men in France, Austria, and Italy are counted as Roman Catholics who have no religion of any kind. The Protestants are set down at ninety millions. The Greek Churches, chiefly the Greek Church, number eighty-five millions, and there are about a million Jews and five million Mohammedans.

"In Christ," Fern Hill, Wash. I am a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and should be obliged if you would state what reason there is for keeping Sunday holy, when Saturday can be set apart in the Commandments.

We keep Sunday as the Lord's Day in celebration of Christ's resurrection. When the Gospel was preached among the Gentiles, the question was raised in the Council of Apostles whether they should be required to keep the Jewish law. You will find the discussion in Acts 15: 28, 29 and you will see that mention is made of their being required to keep the Jewish Sabbath. But we do not mean the day as a Sabbath which is to be a day of absolute rest; we mean it in holy activity in the Lord's service. There seems good reason to believe that the Apostles at the early church kept Sunday as a weekly day of worship and celebration, and we know certainly that fifteen centuries it has been thus observed throughout Christendom.

Student, Baltimore, Md. What is the meaning of the expression in Rev. 18: 24, 25: "In whose heart are treasured up all manner of evil things?"

The Psalmist had been dwelling on the happiness of the people who were continually in and about the Temple, taking part in the sacrifices. He goes on to say practical the still more blessed is the man whose heart is a temple of God. The temple service brought the worshiper near to God, but the man was still nearer who not being able to go up to the Temple, found in his own heart the ways of God, and could worship him in spirit and in truth.

M. P., Broadhead, Ky. What is the meaning of the exclusion from his society of the people who have not the Holy Spirit, as mentioned in Rev. 19: 15?

Students of prophecy generally believe that in the time of persecution, under Antichrist in the last years of this dispensation, the great enemy of Christ will be able to forbid a person buying or selling who does not acknowledge allegiance to him. The sign of such allegiance will be the wearing of some token which will indicate the person's entire following. The number is thought to be the sum of the values of the Greek letters forming his name.

"Subscriber," Bella Vista, Cal. 1. Is it necessary to belong to a church to be saved? 2. Is it necessary to have a good life in order to be saved? 3. Is it necessary to have a good life in order to be saved? 4. Is it necessary to have a good life in order to be saved? 5. Is it necessary to have a good life in order to be saved?

1. Joining a church is in our time the recognized mode of confessing Christ before men. Christ requires an open and public confession of him, and says that he will be ashamed of him who does not render it (See Luke 26). It is not, however, essential to salvation because a man might be so situated as that it would be impossible for him to join a church. 2. We are distinctly taught that there are degrees of glory in heaven (See 1 Cor. 15: 41), but not that they are determined in any way by the number of years of service. In the Parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard (Matt. 20: 1-16) seems to imply the contrary. We believe that grief will be excluded from heaven and that in such a case as you mention, father and son will cheerfully acquiesce in arrangements whatever they may be.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning October 18.
Matt. 5: 13-16; 25: 14-30.

ARE we doing our best? is the question propounded for our consideration this week. It is well that it is put in the first person, because in the second, it might be an impertinence and in the third it might provoke unjust and uncharitable criticism. No one knows besides the person concerned, whether he is doing the best work of which he is capable, and even he may discover that there is still better work that he might do, if he would take the right measures for the development of his powers. Perhaps the best service that can be rendered would be to suggest some hindrances, which often prevent the young Christian doing the best he has the power to do. One of the most common hindrance is a lack of courage, a shrinking from publicity, a fear that he has not the capacity for the work that needs doing. Some of the best workers have experienced this timidity. Even now, the mightiest of Scottish preachers, shrank from the work, believing that he did not the necessary qualifications and was almost forced to the pulpit against his will. While there are more people who force themselves to the pulpit at the prompting of ambition, there are still more who hold back from fear of failure. It is, however, in the humbler duties, that diffidence operates as a hindrance most frequently. The word that should be spoken for Christ to a business acquaintance, the kindly invitation of a stranger to church, the effort to gather a few children from the street into the Sunday school, all these require moral courage and are frequently left undone through diffidence. We need to remind ourselves that duty close to our hand, needs doing and that we are responsible for its performance. We are not responsible for success, but only for doing the best we can. The poet Young, says: "He that does the best his circumstance allows, does well; angels could do no more." God does not expect from us the work that we are disqualified from performing but he does expect that such powers as he has given us shall be used. The man in the parable, who had gained two talents, received the same commendation as he who had gained five, he having had less capital to work with. It was the man who did not use his talent that was blamed. He probably thought it was too small to use with any effect.

Another hindrance is worldliness. It is astonishing how quickly worldly thoughts will paralyze the power for service.

A third hindrance is self-indulgence. The body needs constant vigilance, lest it assert its power over the spirit and clog it and impede its operations. Every one knows how his energies are impaired after heavy meal and other forms of physical indulgence, and it is easily possible for the impairment to become chronic. A famous preacher likens the spirit in the body to a candle shining in a lantern, and warns us that the glass may become so coated with dust, that the light can scarcely be seen. Another hindrance is lack of faith. A right view of the promised blessing would convince us that the power is not in ourselves, and that God can bless the weakest if he goes forward trusting in him. Our best may be inadequate, but the power of the Holy Spirit, which is promised to the earnest worker, is almighty.

NOT MINE.
It is not mine to run
With eager feet
Along life's crowded ways,
My Lord to meet.
It is not mine to pour
The oil and wine.
Or bring the purple robe
And linen fine.
It is not mine to break
At his dear feet
The alabaster-box
Of ointment sweet.
It is not mine to bear
His heavy cross,
Or suffer for his sake,
All pain and loss.

Yet, Master, if I may Make one pale flower
Bloom brighter, for thy sake,
Through one short hour;
If I, in harvest-fields
Where strong ones reap,
May bind one golden sheaf
For Love to keep;
May speak one quiet word
When all is still.
Helping some fainting heart
To bear thy will;
Or sing one high, clear song,
On which may soar
Some glad soul heavenward,
I ask no more.

The Prophetic Parables.

The Era of the Parable of the Pearl of Great Price.

BY GEO. H. PEMBER, M. A.

IN this similitude the scene changes: the solid field breaks up into the ever-shifting waves of the sea, and the secret of the Kingdom is found as a pearl in its lowest depths. This points to times like those on which we seem already to be entering; times in which the narrow boundaries of sect are becoming indistinct, and are little noticed, while almost every man holds his own peculiar opinions. And, just as the pearl lies far beneath the restless surface of the waves, so, in no distant day, will the Word of God be hidden beneath the many waters of perpetually changing confessions, creeds, sects, opinions, and philosophies; and still later, at the culmination of the great apostasy, its very existence will be almost forgotten. The truth of God will be no more found, as it were, accidentally—as a man unexpectedly stumbles upon treasure-trove—but only by means of earnest inquiry.

For in this case a merchant, who knows the value of pearls, is seeking for them; and the reward of his diligence is the discovery of the pearl of great price, to obtain which he gives up all that he has. The Lord thus signifies that, even in the perilous times of the end, those who are really desirous of truth will be guided to the great truth. But, as we learn from other prophecies, their sincerity will be sorely tested; they will have to turn away from that which is exciting the enthusiasm of the whole world in order to begin the search; and, when they have been successful, may be required to surrender family, position, property and even life itself, if they would possess the prize.

Since, however, the merchant is able to find the pearl, we are taught that God will not leave himself altogether without witnesses, while the Lawless One is reigning: there will yet be fishers, blessed of him, who will be empowered to bring up his truth from beneath the troubled waters of human opinions, and to offer it to those who are honestly seeking for "glory and honor and immortality."

If we look around us, we cannot but suspect that we are living in the transitional period between the previous Parable and that which we are now considering. Already, on every side, the fields of dogma are breaking up, and where one distinct and unalterable law was wont to prevail, there is nothing but uncertainty and innumerable opinions—opinions, too, which rarely claim to be derived from the revelation of God, but are avowedly based upon human authority, whether ancient or modern, whether ecclesiastical or secular.

The Protestant sects, as communities, attracted by human traditions and philosophies, are ceasing to hold fast the Head, and becoming less and less able to withstand the powerful influx of corruption. Those principles which used to characterize them are, like houses surprised by an inundation, already tottering, and threatening every moment to fall through the violence of the floods; so that shortly nothing will be seen but the tumultuous waters out of which Satan will evoke the last great enemy of Christ. The scarcely noticed summer stream has swelled into a broad and foaming river, and is bringing destruction with it from the mountains. But those who are in the ark will be safe.

THE SHIELD OF A CHRISTIAN MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

CHAPTER X.

Reminiscences.

A WINTERY day, snow deep on all the roads, but getting hard and promising sleighing. In Mrs. Seymour's home everything was bright and cheerful. The open fire cast a ruddy glow in the room and mother and son sat reading and writing till the sun grew low in the West.

"Two ladies to see you, ma'am," said the servant, throwing open the door of the room.

The words were scarcely spoken when two young arms were thrown around the old woman's neck and her face was covered with kisses. Carrie Walter had returned from school that day, bringing her school friend, Nellie Price, with her, and had been unable to spend the evening contentedly till she had seen her beloved Sunday school teacher.

"How you have grown," exclaimed the old woman, when she had released herself from the girl's embrace and had greeted Carrie's friend. "You seem to have developed suddenly from a child to a young lady. I never saw such a change in so short a time."

"And she is more like you than ever, mamma," said Milton.

"That is your way of paying a compliment," said Carrie. "I think you could not pay me a higher one."

"It is true," said Milton, "and you will tell other people will tell you so, too."

"Well, never mind my looks. Tell me everything that has happened while I have been away. I am just dying to hear. He tells me no news in his letters."

They sat talking happily for some time, and the sound of sleigh-bells was heard outside.

"That is Papa come to take us home," said Carrie.

"We told him we were coming here, and he had a call to make in the town, he promised to drive around for us."

"This was the Deacon's first visit to Mrs. Seymour's cottage, for it could hardly be said a visit to herself. Having stamped the snow off his boots and blanketed his horse carefully, he came in.

"I am happy to see you, Deacon Walter," said the widow, blushing, and trying to forget old differences. "This is the first visit we have received from you. Walk up to the fire and be seated."

"Well, now," said the Deacon, as he mechanically threw off his great coat and walked up to the fire, "Mrs. Seymour, you know I don't visit much—a lonesome man, full of business, and with an only daughter at school, I seldom go visiting."

The Deacon seemed to be disconcerted under restraint, and stood gazing at Mrs. Seymour intently.

"Unless some one meets with an accident, or gets sick or poor," said Carrie, "I never visits. You must first relieve yourself in distress to Mr. Hellings, that will bring Deacon Walter to your house inside of three hours, Mrs. Seymour."

"Sally, Carrie," said Mrs. Seymour, "these are the conditions, one would desire to see your father often; but I remember your directions." Then, turning to Mr. Walter, she continued: "I have never called during the ten years I have lived in Brookdale. This being the first, I hope it will not be your last visit, Deacon Walter; we are nearly always at home, and will be pleased to see you, thank you," answered the deacon abstractedly, and with some confusion still staring at the widow.

"Looking around, he saw two rooms of a house, not half so large as his own apartments, and yet the parlors had more taste displayed in their furnishing, and evidences of more real comfort than he had seen since leaving his cottage in Scotland, fourteen years before.

It carried his thoughts back to his youthful home, and made him almost think that he was again in his own parlor there, beside the little grate fire, talking to the daughters of his poor neighbors, whom his wife would sometimes bring in at evening for a friendly talk. Then his countenance changed, as his mind recurred to that awful shipwreck, after he had started for America. He remembered the howling tempest, the furious waves dashing across the ship's deck; the shouts of the captain and seamen; the groaning of the machinery; and, finally, the fearful crash which threw one hundred souls into the boiling waters. Deep down in his heart, and stamped indelibly upon the tablets of memory, was the scene where he had tied two spars together; then, lashing his wife and only child to them, had leaped with them into the sea.

He remembered how the shock was too severe for the delicate constitution of his wife, who died upon the spar, with her fearful face turned toward him, as she grasped her baby in her stiffening arms. How the vessel went down, and how, almost by a miracle, after floating about on the debris for several hours, he and his motherless girl-baby were finally picked up and carried to Algiers, whence they sailed for America.

All this flashed across his mind, and induced silence, which might have continued, had not Carrie spoken to him. Turning suddenly, his eyes rested upon a portrait, which hung on the wall. It was a life-size head of Mrs. Seymour's only sister, long since deceased, and a sweeter face was seldom seen. The deacon looked at it earnestly, and, lifting the lamp, walked up to take a closer view.

He gazed at the portrait for a moment, when, staggering backward, as if about to faint, he was with difficulty prevented from falling to the floor by Milton, who led him to a chair.

"It is nothing," said the deacon. "I feel unwell, and my thoughts have taken me to strange places to-night. I ask pardon if I have caused you alarm."

Both Mrs. Seymour and Carrie were much concerned, and did all in their power to relieve him. As the deacon looked at the widow, with her pale face, another strange sensation came over him. He trembled violently, and nothing but a strong will saved him from again being overcome.

The cause of his trouble was that the widow, as well as her sister's portrait, brought forcibly to his recollection the face of his once beloved and now deceased wife.

Once in the bracing air, he was again the same stern, but frank and kind-hearted Deacon Walter. Milton offered to drive them to the Walter house and walk back, but the deacon declined his aid, and off they started. They had passed a very pleasant evening, although it was marred by a scene shrouded in mystery to every one save the deacon.

The only explanation he gave to Carrie was, that something about Mrs. Seymour and her cottage brought up recollections which made him very unhappy, and he hoped he should never be called upon to go there again!

"That was a strange attack the deacon had said Milton, as he and his mother drew their chairs to the fire when their visitors had departed. "I wonder what caused it."

"Some distressing memory, I suspect," said Mrs. Seymour. "He sees very little of domestic life and perhaps a cozy home like this recalled sad associations. He said something of the kind you remember. You will find as you grow older that life is very apt to have such associations. There are rooms we close and never mean to look into again, but some unexpected event or some familiar scene flings the door open in spite of us and we have to look at the past."

"Well, he need not dwell in the past, with so beautiful a girl as his daughter by his side. Is it not strange how like you she is growing?"

"Now you are flattering me. I have more reason than Carrie had to complain of you. Her fresh young beauty is so sweet that I wonder she thought you were praising her. If there is a resemblance and I think there may be in her expression it is not so extraordinary. I have often been struck by strange resemblances in people who have never even seen each other. I have met several people since I have been in America who are very like people I knew in Europe. When we remember that nature has only five or six features to operate with it is wonderful that she is able to produce such endless variety in faces as she does. I wonder there are not more duplicates."

Milton was silent for some minutes looking thoughtfully into the fire. Suddenly he looked up and said: "You spoke just now of closed rooms and you seemed to speak from experience. Are there any closed rooms in your history. Tell me about them, mamma, if there are."

"Yes, it will be painful, but you ought to know. I have often thought I would tell you, but I have never had the courage."

Mrs. Seymour covered her eyes with her hand, silently praying for strength. Then, with sudden decision, she said:

"My maiden name, as you know, was Maud Caroline Heath. I was the younger of two sisters, living with our aged father, Robert Heath, at his mansion in Leicestershire, England."

A young scion of nobility, the third son of an Earl, had been very attentive to me for a year, and, being smitten with an attachment that he thought was love, and encouraged by my father and elder sister, sought my hand in marriage. But, knowing of his dissipated habits and gambling propensities, I declined to marry a man whom I did not even respect, much less love. Besides, I had a preference for another. My father and sister were both against me, daily arguing and urging me to accept the suitor, until my home became a very uncomfortable place.

Mr. Harrison Seymour was an American, an attache of the United States diplomatic service, with an office at a seaport town, three miles from our home. He frequently visited us, and a warm attachment sprang up between him and me. Hearing that the Earl's son was forcing his attentions upon me, and of the cruelty of my family, Mr. Seymour told me of his love, of his past life, his present position, and his future hopes and prospects.

"I confessed affection for him in return, and we were soon engaged. My conscience, however, smote me for taking this step without my father's consent, and, at my request, Mr. Seymour sought the old gentleman to converse with him upon the subject. He was not only repulsed, before he could explain himself, but was forbidden to enter the Heath mansion again."

"This led to a family quarrel which resulted in my withdrawal from my father's house. Mr. Seymour heard of my leaving home. He found me and we were soon after married in the little chapel."

"My father relented, however, after hearing of the marriage, and sent his carriage for us, with assurance of forgiveness and apologies for his conduct. The accompanying letter also stated that my sister, who had been very officious and disagreeable, had gone to Scotland, to be absent for a year or more."

"This sister frequently wrote to her father, but never to me; and we prolonged our stay at the homestead, not because my father seemed to be entirely reconciled, but because I felt that a man of seventy-five years needed my affectionate attention in the absence of his other daughter. The old gentleman sometimes seemed like himself, but always bitterly regretted the failure of his favorite scheme to have an aristocratic son-in-law; and, besides, he never liked Mr. Seymour, while my sister declared before leaving home, that she would not recognize her sister's marriage to 'a Yankee politician.' You were born in my father's house: an event of no small moment in the Heath household. You appeared to be a peace offering between your grandfather and us. The old man seldom passed an hour in the day without seeking you, whom he loved tenderly, and this rendered our stay more agreeable. In the meanwhile my sister in Scotland, unknown to us, but with the knowledge and consent of her father, had married a wealthy cotton and woolen manufacturer, and the son of one of my father's college chums."

"When you were two years old a sweet little sister came to add to our happiness. Contrary to the usual workings of nature, you resembled your beloved father in all external appearances, while the little babe looked, so far as a soft baby face can look, like me. About the same time my sister wrote to my father that she, too, had become the mother of a daughter."

"When the dear babe, who was named Maud after me, was about six months old my husband was in Hungary, having been ordered there by his Government at Washington, to investigate some complications arising from the arrest of an American citizen. He was taken ill with a fever while there, and the Consul, fearing that he would die, telegraphed to me to come immediately to his assistance. Making the best arrangements I could for the babe, and for my father's comfort, I took you with me and left England with a heavy heart, but with the consciousness of doing what seemed to be right. The voyage was an errand of love and duty, and strength equal to my day was given to me."

"My sister still cherished her resentment against me on account of my marriage. She had never written to me nor been home, but now taking the opportunity of my absence, she came on a visit to her father, bringing her babe with her. While at Heath manor, a remarkable resemblance of the babies to each other was apparent. So much alike were they that the family physician, in a joking way, advised grandfather Heath to 'get one of their ears clipped, to prevent a disagreeable mixing up, some fine day,' and he actually did touch one of their shoulders with caustic. They were dressed differently, and each had a separate nurse; but their resemblance was very striking."

"I cannot bear even at this distance of time to describe the terrible calamity that occurred. My darling little girl was drowned. Drowned through the carelessness of the nurses, while the two children were taking their morning bath. The nurses left them playing in the bath-tub, and went away to see some sight from the windows, and in some way the tap was turned, the bath-tub filled, and my sweet girl was found face downward at the bottom, dead."

"Soon after this event, old Mr. Heath died, leaving all his property, by will, to my sister, not recognizing my claims at all; and this was followed by a most unfeeling letter from my sister, enclosing a copy of her father's will, and telling me of his death. This, added to my anxiety for my husband made me ill."

"I have never seen the home of my childhood since that time. I could not go there after receiving such a letter as my sister wrote me. As soon as my dear husband was able to travel, we sailed for America, hoping that his native air would complete his recovery. But we were disappointed. He had a relapse soon after we landed, and he never recovered. I was alone in the wide world save for you, my dear son. Now I have told you all, and you know what a troubled life your mother has had, and can account for my frequent fits of depression."

"Poor mother," said Milton, "I am glad I know; I shall love you all the more, and try to make up to you for your troubles. Have you heard of your sister since?"

"Not directly. I did hear that all her property had been swept away in a panic, and that she was drowned at sea while on a voyage to America, where she and her husband were coming to retrieve their fortunes, but the news was not confirmed. Recently there came news of some one having made a confession of some wrong done me by which my sister had profited, but I have not inquired into it. There can be no wrongs that can be redressed now. I am trying to forget the past and to hope for the future. If you turn out well, that will be better to me than any redressing of past wrongs."

"With God's help, mamma," said Milton, solemnly, "you shall have that consolation."

Preacher from Arimathea.

Nicola Eyoub Tams, and his Labors for Christ in his Native Land.

FEW weeks ago, an eloquent Oriental preacher, with a career of more than usual interest, arrived in New York, and at the present time is engaged in addressing religious audiences throughout the country. His name is Nicola Eyoub Tams, and he is a native of the ancient village of Arimathea in Pales-

PREACHER TAMS OF ARIMATEA, AND FAMILY.

which was the dwelling-place of Joseph, the rich, devout Hebrew in whose sepulchre the body of Jesus was laid after the crucifixion. Mr. Tams' parents are descendants of Greek Crusaders, unable to return to their native land, fled in Palestine and ultimately became reconciled to their new Syrian homes. Mr. Tams' parents were born in the village of Meddyob, near Nablous, and about three miles distant from "Jacob's Well," where he cultivated the soil. Like many others, however, they suffered from Turkish oppression and extortion. They were compelled to submit to insults, to yield compulsory labor without return, and to scourging, cursing, plucking of old men's beards, spitting on venerable faces, and many other grievances. Their wives and sisters were subjected to gross insult, and so intolerable did the oppression become that many were glad to flee to remote districts leaving all their property behind. Mr. Tams' parents removed to Arimathea, where the aged father, once owner of farms, became a hired laborer with others. There the eldest son was born, and was hopefully named Nicola (meaning "I conquer"), a second son being called Jesus, or "Deliverer". In all his years were born to the persecuted household. All were baptized in the Christian faith, according to the rites of the Russo-Greek Church. Nicola was educated at Bishop Gobat's college on Mount Zion, Jerusalem, and besides a thorough training in church and secular history, he became proficient in the use of five languages, English, German, French, Italian, and Arabic. Early in life he had deep religious impressions. It was a hard struggle for the poor young student, whose family (his father being dead), could give him no financial aid, but he worked at bead-making, at olive-gathering, at cemetery wall building, and in various other ways to earn money for books. To recount his struggles at this period would occupy columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. After several years of this hard experience, he was engaged to assist in the Mission school classes conducted at Jaffa, by Rev. J. R. Longley Hall, and afterward became native school-master in his own birth-place, Arimathea. Nicola's experiences did not end here. He worked at many callings in the effort to make a livelihood. Once he labored as a builder for the Church Missionary Society on a new Mission House and School; at another time he invested his small means in a mule and some goods and undertook to trade among the Galilean peasantry, but a dishonest partner left him again penniless. Next he engaged in the timber trade between Jaffa and Tarsus and Asia Minor ports, and had charge of native laborers who handled the timber at "Moon's Pool" in Jaffa (directly under the traditional house of Simon the Tanner.) At this time Nicola was leading a godless and irreligious life, and as he himself describes his state:

"I slighted the Church of my fathers, neglected fastings, prayers, etc., and so in a very short time, gradually I was an established infidel and reviled my Maker, and used such language as would make heaven shake by my blasphemous utterances. I used all my power to oppose the good mission work and so became a stumbling block and great offence to many, full of pride and iniquity, denying the demands of Heaven's laws."

About this time, he received a letter, announcing the death of a brother, and shortly afterward his aged mother grew sick unto death. Several dear friends died in rapid succession and Nicola, stunned by these calamities, reflected remorsefully upon his own backsliding. The rites of his own church gave him no comfort, and he was in great distress of mind and cried to the Lord for mercy. His heart was directed to the Redeemer, and after a season of sharp trial and earnest prayer, he found peace in believing.

Since that time, his life has been totally changed. No longer a formalist, he has become an ardent disciple and follower of the man of Galilee. By the Grecian clergy he was denounced as a heretic and excommunicated, but he cared nothing for these things. He united with the Evangelical Church at Jaffa, and was elected on the board of the native Church Council. He married in 1884 an excellent Christian native lady, who was educated in the German Deaconesses School, the "Taliitha Cumi," at Jerusalem. Four children blessed the union.

Shortly after his conversion he visited England, where he did missionary service for a time in connection with Mrs. M. Baxter's Missionary Training School in London. In Leeds, he became a member of the Primitive Methodist Church, and was accredited as a Local Preacher. He traveled, preached, and lectured in twenty-five counties, including many large cities, and his meetings were largely attended, many souls being won through his earnest appeals. He has since labored among the Wesleyans, Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, Free Church, Presbyterians and various Missionary Societies, and his efforts have been most signally blessed. He returned to Palestine in 1895 and in the winter of that year again visited England, where he remained until lately. His visit to this country is for the purpose of preaching the Gospel and lecturing on the manners, customs, and people of the Holy Land. Few speakers are better equipped, for, being a native of superior education, wide travel, and with a genuine talent for oratory, Mr. Tams has the rare faculty of interesting his auditors, and awakening their enthusiasm. He has already lectured and preached acceptably in different American cities. His lectures, with the accompaniment of beautiful costume and illustrations, are a faithful and graphic portraiture of modern Oriental life. He intends to devote the money earned in this way to founding an Ophthalmic Hospital, Orphanage, and Mission Church in Arimathea, his native place, the great prevalence of eye diseases among all classes—and especially among the poor—rendering such an institution most desirable. Pastors or Church Committees, or Sunday Schools wishing to communicate with Mr. Nicola Eyoub Tams can address him in the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

ASKED for grace to lift me high,
 Above the world's depressing cares ;
 I sent me sorrows—with a sigh
 I said, " He has not heard my prayers

 When I expected light from God.
 ut soon I found that sorrow, worn
 As duty's garment, strength supplies,

Who Knows Them and Their Peculiarities—The Folly of Darwinism.

 All animals, monkeys most resemble man. My home is in the north of Ceylon, and the history of my early days is rather closely associated with adventures among monkeys. When I was a mere boy, I used to spend much of my time in the company of a large troop of monkeys. About one hundred of them lived in our large compound, with its many palm-trees and cocoanut trees, its masses of mango and jack-trees, its thickets and its peerless white sand-banks. Sometimes I said that man is the only rational creature, but monkeys often make actions that look very much like reason, and they are clever in grinning and facially expressing anger. It is an interesting spectacle to see them march in a perfect, orderly manner, like a well-disciplined regiment of troops. They would sometimes march in a single file, sometimes in two files, according to their pleasure and whim. As a rule, monkeys are quite dexterous in using their hands. They handle things as men do, and some of their exercises, such as leaping from the branch of one palm-tree over one hundred feet to another of the same height at a distance of about twenty yards, with their hands and feet firmly clinging to the bark, is enough to make one's hair stand on end. The slightest mistake they might make in their leap would result in instant death; yet they never make mistakes. They are always very active. Sometimes they sit on the branch of a tree, swinging it to an extent that threatens to break the branch from the tree, but they are too clever to make any such calculation. Monkeys take great pleasure in playing and frightening children. I have often been maltreated by my monkey friends. I would be surrounded by a number of them, and they would rob me of my other dainties with dexterity and without compunction. Any hostile demonstration on my part would merely bring down their wrath on my head. But they dared not touch me if some elderly monkey was near.

On a bright summer day, just before sunset, a number of them came to pay me a visit, and unfortunately I was alone. I saw them at a distance of about twenty yards, ran into a room and bolted the door, being unwilling to entertain such a party when no one else was at home. I looked through the key-hole to see what the monkeys were doing. The leader walked towards the kitchen, opened the door with his hands, and invited all his followers to step in and partake of the food which had been cooked and kept ready for the owner. It was amusing to see them enter the room in orderly fashion, pass the dishes containing food, and dine among themselves. Having dined, the younger and more energetic monkeys leaped about and turned somersaults, and then all took their way to the adjacent palm-tree grove.

There are two kinds of monkeys, those that live about in company, and those that live singly. The latter are very unattractive, and much larger in size. They are looked upon as outcasts, and are often despised by the other kind of monkeys, although between them being of everyday occurrence.

Monkeys in India and Ceylon teach their young to play tricks. It is not difficult to catch them. A small hole, just sufficient to let the monkey's hand in, is bored in a tender cocoanut, which is placed beside a tree. The animal will come and put his hand into the cocoanut, gather from inside as much as it can hold in its hand, and then try to extricate the hand, which of course is impossible, the closed hand being too large to come out through the hole. While engaged in its foolish task, one can run to it and make it an easy prisoner. The monkey will not lose its hold, even if it knows its life to be in imminent danger. In Ceylon a man who most tenaciously and stubbornly holds to his opinions, right or wrong, is said to take a "monkey-hold."

When the monkeys see a gun leveled at them, they will raise their clasped hands above their heads, and in every possible way entreat you not to shoot. I have often, by directing a mock gun against them, made them cringe and bow to me. Of all the lower animals, they are the most amusing, but I can never persuade myself to be a Darwinian. There is a great variety of animals, and doubtless the monkey resembles man to some extent in outward form, but to one who knows them it seems pure lunacy to think that man descended from monkeys.

who is now away on a debauch, his character and position sacrificed. God alone can save him and he has promised to answer prayer.—Father, Hanona, Minn., for the conversion of his son, a physician, who has great influence on the people around him. He is an unbeliever, and has no realization of his need of a Saviour.—C. N. J., that two lawyers, and a physician and his wife, who are leaders of society, may be brought to seek Christ and to give themselves to him.—“Sister in Christ,” for the conversion of her husband and that he may be delivered from drink and profanity.—L. L. B. Pittsburg, Pa., that a son, who has wandered from his Saviour, may be restored and may give his life to the Lord’s service.—Troubled One, Winnebago City, Minn., that a young man, who is in deep trouble and fears that it is impossible to get pardon for his sins, may learn the power of Christ’s salvation and may find peace in him, and that he may be kept from committing a fearful sin that he is being tempted to commit.—Sorrowing Wife, St. Johnsbury, Vt., that God would touch the heart of her husband, who has deserted her and his home, and would cause him to seek pardon for all his sins through Christ, and that he may become a new creature by the power of the Holy Spirit.—S. M. T., Columbus, Ga., for the conversion of three brothers and a sister, all of whom need the grace of God for the salvation of their souls.—J. K., Hancock, Mich., that a dear brother, whose sinful ways are a great grief to his family, may be reclaimed and led to renounce sin and trust in Christ for salvation.—Constant Reader, New York City, for the conversion of two brothers, whose profanity and irreverence of holy things is a source of distress to their Christian relatives; also that a dear son, whose bondage to tobacco is keeping him from Christ, may renounce that and every thing else that is a hindrance to his salvation.—Anxious Father, Brooklyn, N. Y., for the conversion of his wife, whose evil passions are making her home a miserable place, and are driving her children to places of amusement as a refuge from her viperous speech. Pray that God may convert her and change her nature, especially her tongue.

For the Restora- Afflicted Mother. Averup and be fully restored if it is God's will.— Loving Sister, Newmarket, Iowa, that a dear brother may be cured and restored to his right mind.—Christian Friend, Harrisburg, Pa., that one heavily afflicted with disease may recover, and that she may be kept from discouragement.—One who has Sinned, Lapland, Kans., that God in his mercy would give back lost health and would pardon past sin and give grace for a new life of atonement.—

Faithful, Adams, Neb., for the recovery of lost sight and the restoration of health.—J. K.
Hancock, Mich., for the recovery of an invalid mother.

For Special Blessings. Firm Believer, Denver, Colo., begs prayers that her husband may have guidance and success in his efforts to obtain employment. —E. J. W., Mayesville, S. C., whose faith is faltering through many discouragements, asks prayer that God would send the funds necessary to build the school in that place, so that the promising young people who are so anxious for an education should receive it. —Minister, Hanover, Ind., that God in his mercy would loan a family in a destitute condition and provide the means of support. —L. L. B., Pittsburg, Pa., that a Christian man who is out of employment and in sore straits may be able to obtain a position that will give him the means of supporting his family. —"Sister in Christ" for guidance and more of the Holy Spirit. —M. E. B., Kalb, S. C., that God's people in that section may be blessed in their efforts to build a house of worship. —"Distressed One," Newfoundland, Pa., who is almost crazy with pain and mental anxiety, asks prayer that her soul may be saved and that she might find rest and peace in the Lord. —"Despondent," Grandview, Tex., that the dread of a terrible disease may be removed and that she may be spared to rear her young family. —"Stranger in a Strange Land," Michigan, that in some way the means may be provided for support, so that it may not be necessary to go out with aching nerves and debilitated body to battle for bread. —C. N. J. and others, that in a certain city there may be a revival of religion soon, and that a class very hard to reach might be brought under the power of the Spirit. —Emma B., Belgrade, Mo., for grace to overcome a violent temper and to lead a holy life. —Faithful, Adams, Neb., that God would bless a special effort soon to be made to win souls to Christ. —Christian Friend, Harrisburg, Pa., that two dear friends who have been alienated from each other may find out the true cause of their alienation, and that it may be removed. —J. E. M., Bryson, Que., that power be given for service and that God would show him plainly whether it is his duty to devote all his life to Christian work. —J. K., Hancock, Mich., that a dear friend who is seeking employment that he may be enabled to support himself and his young wife may soon find it; also that the people of Ontonagon, who have lost employment and their property in the fire that consumed the whole town, may in the mercy of God be kept from starvation and that they may find work speedily, and that the destroyed industries may soon be built up again. —Constant Reader, that God would open to her some Christian home where she and her little ones might dwell in peace.

Thanks for Answered Prayer.

L. L. B., Pittsburg, Pa., gratefully acknowledges the answer to prayers recently asked for in these columns, that he soon might secure employment.—Distressed Father, Brooklyn, N. Y., desires humbly to offer thanks to the readers and the Bowery Mission for their prayers and to devoutly praise God for the answer that has been received. The request was made in fear and trembling and in grave doubt if it could be answered and with profound consciousness that he did not deserve the blessing sought, but God has been better to him than his fears. For the encouragement of other distressed souls he wishes to publicly testify that "this poor man cried and the Lord heard him." Our God is very long-suffering and full of compassion.—Believer, Buffalo, N. Y., "Thank God for me for the answer which has come to the prayers you offered at my request for the recovery of some members of my family who were very sick when I wrote you, but are now getting well."—Subscriber, New York, "The prayers you were kind enough to offer in my behalf recently have been answered. Praise God."

Persons desiring the prayers of the Converts' Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission should address their letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 91-102 Bible House, New York.

Armageddon.

Sermon by : : : : :
Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D.
Text, Revelation 16: 16:

"And he gathered them together in a place called in the Hebrew tongue, Armageddon."

ARMAGEDDON is the name of a mountain that looks down upon Esdraelon, the greatest battle-field that the world has ever seen. There Barak fought the Canaanites; there Gideon fought the Midianites; there Josiah fought the invading Egyptians. The whole region stands for battle, and the Armageddon of my text borrows its name from it, and is here used, not geographically, but figuratively, while setting forth the idea that there is to be a world's closing battle, the greatest of all battles, compared with which the conflicts of this century and all other centuries were insignificant, because of the greater number of combatants engaged, the greater victory and the greater defeat. The exact date of that battle we do not know, and the exact locality is uncertain. It may be in Asia, Europe, Africa or America; but the fact that such a battle will take place is as certain as God's eternal truth. When I use the superlative degree in regard to that coming conflict, I do not forget that there have been wars all along on stupendous scale. As when at Marathon Miltiades brought on his men, not in ordinary march, but in full run, upon the horsemen of Persia and the black archers of Ethiopia, and scattered them, and crying, "Bring fire! Bring fire!" set into flame the ships of the invaders. As when Pizarro overcame Peru. As when Philip the Second triumphed over Portugal. As when the Huns met the Goths. As when three hundred Spartans sacrificed themselves at Thermopylae. As when the Carthaginians took Agrigentum. As when Alexander headed the Macedonian phalanx. As when Hannibal invaded Italy. Battle of Hastings! Battle of Valmy! Battle of Pultowa! Battle of Arbelat! Battle of Tours! Battle of Borodino! Battle of Lucknow! Battle of Solferino! Battle of Fontenoy where 100,000 were slain! Battle of Chalons where 300,000 were massacred! Battle of Herat where Genghis Khan destroyed 1,600,000 lives! Battle of Neishar where 1,747,000 went down to death! 1,816,000 slain at Troy! And American battles, too near us now to allow us to appreciate their awful grandeur and magnitude, except you who have been in the North or in the South! But all the battles I have named put together will not equal in numbers enlisted, or fierceness, or grandeur, or triumph, or rout, the coming Armageddon contest. Whether it shall be fought with printers' type or keen steel, whether by the pen or the sword, I do not know, and you may take what I say as figurative or literal, but take as certain what St. John, in his vision on the rocks of the Grecian archipelago, is pleased to call "Armageddon."

My sermon will first mention the regiments that will be engaged in the conflict; then the weapons of the combatants on both sides; and then speak of the battle itself—the Armageddon. I mention first the regiments. Diabolic. In this very chapter from which my text is taken we are told that the spirits of devils will be there. How many millions of them no one can tell, for have never been reported and the roll of that host has never on earth been called; but from the direful, and continental, and planetary work they have already done, and the fact that every man and woman and child on earth has a tempter, there must be at least sixteen hundred millions of evil spirits familiar with our world. Perhaps as many more are engaged on especial enterprises of abomination among the nations and empires of the earth. Beside that there must be an inconceivable number of inhabitants in realms pandemoniac, staying there to keep the great capitals of sin going from age to age. Many of them once lived in heaven, but engaging in conspiracy to put Satan on the throne, they were hurled out and down, and they are now among the worst thugs of the universe. Having been in three worlds,—heaven, earth, and hell,—they have all the advantages of great experience. Their power, their speed, their cunning, their hostility wonderful beyond all statement! In the Armageddon they will, I doubt not, be present in full array. They will have no reserve corps, but all will be at the front. There will not only be soldiers in that battle who can be seen and aimed at, but troops intangible and without corporeity, and weapons may strike clear through them without giving them hurt. With what shout of defiance will they climb up the ladders of fire and leap from the battlements of asbestos into the last campaign of hell! Paul, the bravest of men, was impressed with their might for evil when he said, "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, and against powers, and against the rulers of the darkness in this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Oh, what an agitating moment, when the ranks diabolic move up and take their places for conflict in the Armageddon!

Other regiments who will march into the fight will be the Regiments Alcoholic. They will be made up of the brewers' companies, distillery owners, and liquor dealers' associations, and the hundreds of millions of their patrons. They will move into the ranks with what the Bible calls the "Song of the drunkard." And what a bloated, and soaked, and bleared, and blasted, and hiccupping, and nauseating host! If now, according to a scientist, in England there are fifty thousand deaths annually from strong drink, and in the United States, according to another estimate, ninety-eight thousand deaths annually from strong drink, what an army of living drunkards that implies, coming up from the whole earth to takes their places in the last battle, especially as the evil increases and the millions now staggering on their way may be joined by other millions of reinforcements; brigade after brigade, with drunkards' bones drumming on the head of beer barrels; the dead march of souls. These millions of victims of alcohol joined by the millions of the victims of arrack, the spirituous liquor of China, and India, and Arabia, and Egypt, and Ceylon, and Siam!

Other regiments who will march into the fight on the wrong side will be the Regiments Infidel. God gave but one revelation to the human race, and these men have been trying to destroy it. Many of the books, magazines, and newspapers, through perpetual scoff at Christianity, and some of the universities, have become recruiting agencies for those regiments. The greatest Brigadier of all those regiments, Voltaire, who closed his life of assault upon Christianity by writing: "Happiness is a dream, and only pain is real. I have thought so for eighty-four years, and I know no better plan than to resign myself to the inevitable and to reflect that flies are born to be devoured by spiders and man to be consumed by care. I wish I had never been born." Oh, the God-forsaken regiments of Infidels, who, after having spent their life in antagonizing the only influence that could make the earth better, gather with their low wit and their vile sneer and their learned idiocy and their horrible blasphemy to take part against God and righteousness in the great Armageddon!

Other regiments who will march in on the wrong side in the battle will be the Regiments Mohammedan. At the present time there are about one hundred and seventy-five million Moslems. Their plain mission is to kill Christians, demean womanhood, and take possession of the earth in the interest of ignorance, superstition, and moral filth. The massacre of fifty thousand Armenians in the last two or three years is only one chapter in their effort to devastate the earth of everything but themselves. So determined are they in their bad work that all the nations of the earth put together dare not say to them, "Stop! or we will make you stop." My hope is that long before that last battle of which I speak, the Turkish Government, and with it Mohammedanism, may be wiped out of existence. The Turkish power for the last four hundred years has been the mightiest hindrance on earth to religious liberty and moral improvement. Her extermination is prophesied in the Book of Revelations in the figure of the drying up of the river Euphrates, and she is going rapidly, thank God! In 1820, by the Greek insurrection, she received the first destructive blow. In 1823, the Turkoman army of thirty thousand was destroyed and the cause of liberty advanced. In 1827, England, France, and Russia, not so cautious as they have since been, at Navarino humiliated the Turkish fleets, and Greece was free. Weaker and weaker the Turkish power has become, and it has lost Algiers and Wallachia, and more than all, during the past decade, through her cruelty, has lost the sympathy of every good man and woman in all the earth, and if William E. Gladstone were Prime Minister of England the Turkish Government would very soon either quit her outrages, or go down under the bombardment of the men-of-war from many nations now hovering near the Bosphorus. But if the Bible prophecy concerning the drying up of the Euphrates is not fulfilled before the battle mentioned in my text, Mohammedanism will march in with sword, and poison, and torch to take her part in the great Armageddon.

Yea! to show the magnitude of the forces on the wrong side, I have to tell you that what is left of heathenism at that time will march into the conflict. There are one hundred and fifty million fetish idolators, two hundred and twenty million Brahmins, four hundred million Buddhists. Through the sublimest movement of this century, the missionary movement, all the time gathering in momentum, I believe all, or nearly all of that seven hundred and seventy millions of heathendom will be converted to God. But that which is not converted will come into the Armageddon on the wrong side.

Other regiments on that wrong side will be made up of offenders of all sorts—the defrauders, the libertines, the dynamiters, the anarchists, the oppressors and the foes of society, the criminals of all nations, by whatever name they are now called, or shall then be called. They may not before that have openly taken sides, but then they will be compelled to take sides. With what venom, with what violence, with what desperation they will fall into line at the great Armageddon! Is it not appalling, these uncounted regiments of the earth, to be joined by the uncounted regiments from perdition? Can any power be with them? Especially when I tell you who their commander is, for so much all wars depends upon the chieftain. Their leader will not be a political accident, a military "happen so." By talent, and valor, and courage, and unceasing industry he has come to the bad eminence he disputed the throne of heaven with the Almighty, but no one has ever disputed the throne of eternal night with this arch who will in the last battle take the field in person. Milton calls him Lucifer. Goethe calls him Mephistopheles, the devil. The Bible calls him Abaddon, the Greek calls him Apollyon. He is the impersonation of all malevolence, of all oppression, of all cruelty, the summing up of all falsehood. In his makeup nothing bad was left out and nothing good was put in, and he to be the General, the Commander-in-Chief of all the forces on the wrong side in the great Armageddon. He has been in more battles than you have ever read about, and he has gained more victories than have ever been celebrated in this world. But I guess this old warrior of Pandemonium will not have an undisputed field. I guess there will be an army to dispute with his forces. I have mentioned the supremacy of this world. I guess the troops will not have to run when, on the day mentioned in my text, all the infernal batteries shall be unlimbered. We have been reviewing the troops diabolic, we have been measuring the calibres of their guns. We have been examining their ammunition wagons. Now let us locate the forces to be marshalled in the Armageddon on the right side.

First of all, I mention the Regiments Angelic. Alas! that the subject of demonology seems better understood than the subject of angelology. But the glorious spirits around the throne and all the blessed immortals that fill the galleries and closets of the universe are to take part in that great fight, and the regiments angelic are the only regiments capable of meeting the regiments plutonic. To show you something of an angel's power, I ask you to consider that just one of them slew a hundred and eighty-five thousand of Sennacherib's hosts in a night, and it is a tough arithmetical question to solve, how an angel can slay one hundred and eighty-five thousand troops in a night, how many can five hundred millions of them slay. The old Book says that "They exclaim in strength." It is not a celestial mob but a disciplined host, and they know their rank. Cherubim, seraphim, thrones, principalities, and powers! And the leader of those regiments is Michael the Archangel. David saw just one group of angels sweep past, and they were twenty thousand charioted. Paul, who in the Galatian college had his faculties so wonderfully developed, confesses his incapacity to count them by saying, "Ye are come to Mount Zion and an innumerable company of angels." If each soul on earth had a guardian angel, then there must be sixteen hundred million angels on earth to go. Beside that, heaven must be full of angels who stay there; not only the two angels who, we are told, guard the two gates, but those angels who help in the worship, and go on mission from mansion to mansion, and help to build the hosannas and enthronement hallelujahs and roll the doxologies of the service that never ends. But they, if required, will be in the last fight between holiness and sin. Heaven could afford to adjourn just one day, and empty all its temples, and mansions, and palaces, and boulevards into that one battle. I think all the angels of God will join in the one that stood with sword of flame at the gate of paradise. The one that poured Hagar to the fountain in the wilderness. The one that halted Balaam on the highway. The one that warned Lot to flee the doomed city. The one that took part with Joshua against the Canaanites.

of that informed Mary of the approach of the Nativity. The one that wrestled with Jacob at the brook Jabbok. The one that swung open the gate for the incarceration of the Apostle Peter. The one that strengthened Christ in his last paroxysm. All, I think, will be there,—their velocities inconceivable, so that when Daniel was in prayer, Grief, we are told, came from heaven to speak to him, and if heaven be at the centre of the universe, that angel must have travelled thousands of millions of miles in an instant. Talk of earthly regiments on a double-quick march! What will be the speed of the regiments angelic, when, at the command of the archangel, "Down to earth! Forward into the battle!" those regiments angelic, lightning-winged, rain-belted, fire-footed, shall sweep into that great Armageddon!

The next regiments that I see marching into the fight will be the Regiments Ecclesiastic. According to the last account, practically only in the beginning of the great Gospel movement which proposes to take the whole earth for God, there are four million six hundred thousand Methodists, three million seven hundred and twenty-five thousand Baptists, one million two hundred and eighty thousand three hundred and thirty-three Presbyterians, one million two hundred and thirty thousand Lutherans, and six hundred and forty thousand Episcopalians. But the present statistics of churches will be utterly swamped when, after all the great denominations have done their best work, the slowest of the sects will have more numbers than the present enrolment of all denominations throughout Christendom. You see by that time an

At last or an Infidel will be a curiosity, and we will be looked at as we look at a man with long hair reaching below his shoulders, and long finger-nails that are not cut, and a stare in the eyes indicating incipient lunacy,—not to be argued with, but to be pitied; while it will not be an unusual thing to see men as much devoted to their religion as Francis Xavier was devoted to his religion, when he went through the streets asking all to come to him, his faith expounded, in ten years planting the Gospel in fifty nations and baptizing over a million souls. And the great hosts of heavers will fill the earth, making the two million three hundred and seventeen thousand combatants that Xerxes reviewed corporal's guard in comparison. I see the regiments ecclesiastic, moving into that last battle. The Lutherans headed by some great Martin Luther yet to be born. The Methodists headed by some George Whitefield yet to come. The Presbyterians headed by some John Knox yet to arise. The Episcopalians headed by some Bishop Charnock yet to be ennobled. The Baptists headed by some Missionary Calvary yet to bless the world. The Congregational Church headed by some Doctor Kim of pentecostal power yet to take the torie of fire. I see them moving into the ranks, carrying a standard striped and stained; striped as suggesting him by whose stripes we are healed, and starred as with the promise that those who turn may to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever. Into that battle on our side will roll those mighty engines of war, the printing-presses of Christendom. Into that battle will also move the mightiest telescopes, that shall bring the ears in their courses to fight for our God.

And, the regiments elemental will come into that battle on the right side. The winds! God showed what he could do with them when the splintered timbers of the Spanish Armada were striven on the rocks of Scotland, Norway, and the Hebrides. The waters! He showed what he could do with them when he put the whole earth under them, leaving it subaqueous one hundred and fifty days. The earthquakes! He showed what he could do with them when he let Caracas drop into the open mouth of horror and the islands of the sea went into entombment. The lightnings! He showed what he could do with them when he wrapped Mount Sinai in flame, and we have all seen their flashing lanterns moving with the chariots of the midnight hurricane. All the regiments elemental will come in on our side in the great Armageddon. Come and let us mount and ride along the line, and review the troops of Emanuel, and find that the regiments terrestrial and celestial that come into that battle on the right side are, as compared with those on the wrong side, two to one, a hundred to one, a thousand to one.

But who is the Commander-in-Chief on this side? Splendid armies have been ruined, caught in traps, flung over precipices, and annihilated through the incompetence or treachery of their general. Who commands on our side? Jehovah-Jireh! so-called in one place. "Captain of Salvation," so-called in another place. King of Kings. Lord of Lords. Conqueror of Conquerors. His eye omniscient. His arm omnipotent. He will take the lead. He will draw the sword. He will give the command. And when he plants his foot for the combat, the foundations that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb, for the great day of his wrath has come, and who shall be able to stand." And while Apollyon, the prisoner of war, is being dragged in chains to his dungeon, and our Conqueror is remounting his throne, I look off upon the battlefield, and among the slain I find the carcasses of Mohammedanism, and Paganism, and Atheism, and Infidelity, and Dissipation, and Fraud, and multitudinous Wrong, strewn the plain, and I hear the angel that standeth in the sun crying, in the words of Revelation, to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven,—the eagles, and the vultures, and the hawks, and the albatrosses,—“Come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God, that ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them.”

The prophesied Armageddon of the text has been fought, and Christ and his followers have won the day. The kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ. All the Christian workers of our time, you, my hearers, and you, my readers, and all the Christian workers of all the ages, have helped on the magnificent result, and the victory is ours as much as theirs. This moment inviting all outsiders, through the ransomed blood of the everlasting Covenant, to get into the ranks of the conquerors, and under the banner of our Leader, I shall not close the service with prayer, as we usually do, but immediately give out the Moravian Hymn, by James Montgomery, appropriate when written in 1819, but more appro-

Marvelous Doings in Africa.

An Almost Miraculous Transformation Going on in Uganda—The New Railroad A Death-Blow to Native Slavery.

LONG before the close of the present century, according to its present rate of progress, Africa will have ceased to be known throughout the world as "The Dark Continent." There will no longer be a justification for the title. So amazingly rapid has been the march of civilization and Christianity throughout its vast area in the last two decades, that the Christian world has good cause to hope for its complete evangelization in the not distant future.

As recently as 1893, the Central African kingdom of Uganda was in a condition of heathenism. Readers of this journal, as well as all who have watched the course of events in Uganda, will remember the events that made it at one time a centre of missionary interest. Alexander Mackay, the devoted missionary, wrote of the dark days the early Gospel workers spent in that heathen kingdom, and Stanley, the explorer, has described Uganda under King M'wanga. One after another of the faithful missionaries laid down their lives for the truth, some dying of the fevers and other diseases peculiar to the country, others perishing under the cruel weapons of the native tribesmen, or slain by those whom the Moslem Arabs had set upon them to "kill the Christians."

In 1884, while M'wanga, was king, the martyr-Bishop Hannington met his death in Uganda, and then followed a great persecution of the missionaries. The year 1885 was one of the darkest in the history of the work. Many native converts were butchered by the king's order. Then came the revolution, and the dethroning of the tyrant king, who became an exile from his own capital.

Anarchy, exile and suffering continued till 1890, when the British East African Company came into the field and the missionaries were once more assured of protection. The Arabs, who had practically ruled the territory during the interim, were now driven out, and M'wanga was restored to the throne; but the whole country was practically governed as a British protectorate. And now has come the wonderful development. The Uganda Railway Bill, which was recently passed by the English Parliament, devoted the sum of $15,000,000 towards the construction of a railway to connect Uganda and Mombasa. Lord Salisbury, in his speech on the second reading of the Bill in the House of Lords, pointed out that the construction of the railway would deal a fatal blow to the slave trade, since no slaves would be conducted by it, and it would dry up the caravan traffic and the trade which supports it, for when once the railway is complete, the caravans will become unprofitable, and will, therefore, stop. Uganda is about 600 miles from the coast. The railway starts at Mombasa Island, which is now connected with the mainland, and will run in a northeasterly direction through Tsavo and Kibwezi, and then past Lake Nairasha, and finally will reach the Victoria Nyanza by a course parallel with that of the River Nzoia.

Rev. E. H. Hubbard, of the Church Missionary Society's station at Nassa, at the south end of the Victoria Nyanza, on his return after five years' residence in Central Africa, described the country as developing at a very rapid rate, the contrast between Uganda to-day and that of 1893 being marvellous. King M'wanga has been presented with a brougham by the government, and dogcarts and other vehicles have been ordered for the government officials. Even bicycles are expected to arrive in Uganda shortly. Everyone in that country, Mr. Hubbard said, was eagerly looking forward to the completion of the railway. Caravans were altogether too long on the road, and were sometimes not heard of for months.

of the earth will quake, and when he shall give the battle-shout, all the gates of hell will tremble.

But do not let us shout until after we have seen the two armies clash in the last struggle. Oh, my soul! The battle of all time and all eternity opens. "Forward!" "Forward!" is the command on both sides given. The long lines of both armies waver, and swing to and fro. Swords of truth against engines infernal. Black-horse cavalry of perdition against white-horse cavalry of heaven. The redemption of this world and the honor of the throne of God to vindicate, how tremendous is the battle! The army of righteousness seems giving way; but no! It is only a part of the manœuvre of the infinite fight. It is a deploy of the host celestial. What a meeting in this field of splendor and wrath, of the angelic and of the diabolic, of hosanna and blasphemy, of song and curse, of the divine and the satanic. The thunderbolts of the Almighty burst and blaze upon the foe. Boom! Boom! By the torches of lightning that illumine the scene I see that the crisis of the Armageddon has come. It is the turning-point of this last battle. The next moment will decide all. Aye! the forces of Apollyon are breaking ranks. See! See! They fly. Some on foot, some on wing; they fly. Back over the battlements of perdition they go down with infinite crash, all the regiments diabolic! Back to the mountains and caves the armed hosts of earth, crying as they retreat to the rocks and mountains, "Fall on us and hide us from the face of him

A Mammoth Petition.

One of the most numerous signed petitions ever presented to royalty has just been laid before Queen Victoria. It is signed in forty-four languages by her women subjects in all parts of the world, praying for increased protection against the evils of the liquor traffic and the opium trade. The petition contains over 7,000,000 signatures and endorsements, and has been gathered during the last few years by the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union. As it is impossible to present the immense roll which contains the names of the British subjects to the Queen, the pages have been photographed and magnificently bound in two large volumes. The title pages are beautifully illuminated, and as a document of historic interest and a work of artistic merit, this polyglot petition is well worth a visit. The Queen never received any document signed by so many of her subjects the world over. The names of Frances Willard, President of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union, and Lady Henry Somerset, Vice-President, head the list.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

7. Praise ye the Lord

Surely in vain the net is spread. Solomon thinks the bird will not go after the bait. It sees the net spread for it, but young people sometimes have less sense. Joh 3. Gough used to tell a story of an aged clergyman who was present at one of his addresses when he was warning young people against being lured into drinking places and dens of vice. The clergyman came to him after his address and said: "You were right, Mr. Gough, in giving that warning. I know it by experience. I went to see a collection of pictures of other abominable things that had been put together by a Christian worker who is waging war on vice. Experienced Christian as I am, those things took such an effect on me that I would willingly give my right hand if by doing so I could blot out of my mind the recollection of what I saw." How must a young man be affected by such things if he has not the grace of God in his heart!

GOSPEL BEACONS FOR "POOR JACK."

the Floating Bethels and Sailors' Missions of New York and Brooklyn, and their Good Work.

CAPT. HIRAM L. MEEKER.

WITHIN the last twenty years, Christian work has multiplied with amazing rapidity on every hand, and has assumed many varied and interesting forms.

Where, only a few years ago, hardly a thought was given to the spiritual condition of the uneducated masses, there are now, in every city and community in the land, excellent organizations for the dissemination of the Gospel and the betterment of the material conditions of our fellow-beings. Besides, the many of Christian workers itself has multiplied so grandly that one finds everywhere devout men and women who are lending their lives and their substance in missionary effort, and whose example is a living and inspiring evangel to others. Among the many forms of Christian work which have arisen in our coast cities, that which aims specially to benefit the toilers of the sea. "Poor Jack is beset with so many temptations, afloat and ashore, that he stands in sore need of all that can be done to help him. In too many cases a godless captain and profane mates make a sea life the very worst calling a young man can follow. It is needless to enumerate the dangers of such a life, the temptations, the companionships that arise, and the hardships that are all too quickly acquired. In the port of the poor wandering sailor, like "a fish out of water," is the ready prey of sharks of either sex, and it too often happens that the dull routine of a sea voyage is followed by a carnival of dissipation that ruins both body and soul. Fortunately, this condition of affairs is now greatly improved. There is hardly a port of consequence in any civilized country where there are not Seamen's Bethels, Missions and Rest homes for Sailors, and Chaplains and Temperance Homes, especially for this class. In these places, which are established and maintained by Christian people, and frequently by liberal-minded corporations, the sailor finds safety and comfort, and is surrounded by pleasant and beneficent influences. New York and Brooklyn have a number of such excellent and deserving places, and some of the work now conducted in the more prominent institutions are indicated in the illustrations in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The senior institution is the New York Port Society, which has now been established seventy-eight years. It began to care for the spiritual needs of the men of the sea in 1818, and has done so since that time steadily without intermission, its corps of missionaries visiting the sailors on shipboard and looking after them ashore as well. Religious meetings are held week-days and Sundays.

There are three branches, two in New York and one in Brooklyn, and the Society's place of worship is the Mariner's Church, 46 Catharine street, New York, where Rev. Samuel Boulton is pastor. The reading-rooms are well supplied with attractive literature and the religious meetings are suited to the needs of seamen. Last year twenty-seven persons were received into the church on confession of faith, and there are large numbers, almost all seamen, who owe their conversion to the means used by the Society to win souls to Christ. These services are held in many different places: in church or chapel, on the great steamers, and sometimes on the docks, and consist of hymns, prayers, and short addresses. Besides the daily religious services in English in the Mariner's Church, meetings are held in "Lettish," (Russian), Scandinavian, Japanese, and Spanish. The records of work for the year ending April 30, 1896 show: Total attendance at religious services, 37,211; visits at reading-room, 49,295; to boarding-houses, 11,230; to vessels, 5,317; to shipping offices, 775; to hospitals, 72. The missionary staff includes Messrs. Paulsen, Hocking, Podin, and Hagglund, and Miss Mary Flora Wight. Assistance is rendered by Mr. and Mrs. Holt, Miss Eva Hawes, Miss Rosella A. Smith, Mrs. Jane Cassera, and others. Testimonies of the new life awakened in many hearts through the instrumentality of the Port Society's workers have been received from almost every quarter of the globe, where the converted sailors have traveled.

Next in point of age comes the New York Protestant Episcopal Missionary Society for Seamen, which has now been fifty-two years in the field. Its President is Bishop Potter, and it has a very distinguished list of managers, clerical and lay. This Society has three Mission Chapels and reading-rooms for seamen along the East river, at which a total of 107,000 attended last year. It has, besides, the "Floating Church of our Saviour," which is anchored at the foot of Pike street, New Church, of which Rev. Archibald R. Mansfield is pastor, regular religious services are held, and there are, besides, clubs, reading-rooms, and entertainment for the sailors. An aggregate attendance at all services at the Floating Church during the year was 5,503, and at the other branches since the organization of the Society 9,060 seamen have signed the pledge at its solicitation. The work is hearty, the music excellent, and the appeals to the men are direct and convincing.

One of the most effective missions for seamen is that conducted by Capt. Hiram L. Meeker, under the auspices of the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society. At the foot of Joralemon street, Brooklyn, Capt. Meeker's church swings at anchor. It is a strongly-built canal boat which has been transformed into a floating Bethel. The Captain, who has spent almost a lifetime afloat, has a tender place in his heart for the sailor men and he knows, far better than most men could possibly know, the nature of numerous temptations that beset them. About three years ago, when he had retired from active service, the Brooklyn City Mission in the Lord's Prayer. Then a Scripture reading and an earnest exhortation from some sailor or the minister present. Then "A Little Talk With Jesus" is sung with great vigor, and is evidently a great favorite. Testimonies follow, and these are usually of such a strong, clear, earnest, and convincing character that no one can hear them without being convinced of the power of Jesus to save even the poor, wandering, sin-sick sailor.

"THE MARINERS' CHURCH," NEW YORK.

The Bethel is not only the sailors' church; it is the club-house as well; so there are often entertainments well-worth hearing, songs, music, recitations, for many talented young people have become interested in this work, and frequently come to the captain's assistance.

It has seating accommodation for 250 men, and at the forward end of the boat is a raised platform, with reading-desk, piano, and chairs. At the other end is a sort of writing-room, where the sailor boys may pen their letters to friends at home. All the current papers and magazines are furnished, and there is a fairly good library of several hundred books. Simple amusements are also supplied, and everything is done to make the Bethel a really attractive place for seamen. Its bluff, old captain is greatly beloved by all. He considers not only the spiritual, mental, and social wants of the men, but their physical needs as well. On his boat no man need go hungry for he declares: "It's hard to make a Christian out of a hungry man. Our Saviour fed five thousand. He knew the way to men's souls better than any other pilot that ever lived." And so, after every meeting, the long tables are spread, and plenty of rolls and cakes and hot, steaming, fragrant coffee, are served. When the men are seated the captain says, "Now, boys, let us ask God's blessing." Every head is bowed. During the months of June, July and August of this year 4,029 sailors were present at the Bethel services; 459 requested to be prayed for and 47 came forward for prayer, 239 signed the pledge, and 2,097 free meals were served during the same period. This average is fairly maintained the year round. The floating Bethel is maintained by voluntary contributions and is unquestionably one of the worthiest of our sailors' missions. Mr. John Englis is Commodore of the Bethel, but the burden of executive duty rests upon bluff old Captain Meeker, who has a full staff of officers from First Officer to Boatswain, organized on the principle of a transatlantic liner, or a man-of-war. The Bethel is shown in one of our illustrations and the colored picture on the first page gives a truthful representation of an evening service on board.

The Seamen's Christian Association of New York has been eight years in existence, and has its present headquarters at 665 Washington street, corner of West Tenth street, just one block from the Hudson river. It is accomplishing a good work among the ships and along the docks of the West side, in aiding and directing sailors who have wandered from the right path.

By these and similar means, adopted by the Christian men and women of the metropolis, the Gospel light is kept brightly burning before the wandering sailors who come to our port. It is a work that expands with every passing year, and is missionary in the highest sense, since it not only appeals to the unconverted at home, but sends the Gospel message abroad to all lands.

"FLOATING CHURCH OF OUR SAVIOUR," NEW YORK.

requested him to undertake evangelistic work among the seamen along the docks. He accepted and soon decided to devote the remainder of his life to the work. But he labored at a disadvantage, having no appropriate meeting-place for those whom he gathered in to his simple Gospel services; so he resolutely set out to raise money for the purchase of a suitable place. After a hard struggle, he succeeded and the canal boat "D. A. Crandall" was bought and fitted up as a Floating Bethel. It is really a floating shelter, mission, reading-room, church and dining-room, and the needy sailormen who go there are fed, kindly spoken to and afforded a comfortable bunk.

But it is as a sailor's church that the Bethel finds its greatest field of usefulness. Regular services are held Sundays and also on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, and many a poor Jack tar has dated his conversion from the time he attended these gatherings. At these evening services the Bethel is bright with lights, the lamps being polished till they shine like mirrors. Speedily the men come trooping in, nearly two hundred in all—sailors from every quarter of the globe. Quite recently a Turk was converted there. They are of all ages, from the man grown gray in the service of Neptune to the fair-haired, rosy-cheeked lad. The most perfect order prevails. During the three years there has never been the slightest occasion for one word of reproof or reprimand. The "Captain" is everywhere; now welcoming a stranger, now assigning seats to the newcomers, now conferring with the organist and choister about the singing. The exercises open with a "Praise Service," and the hymns can be heard for blocks away. A minister offers a brief prayer. At its conclusion the whole congregation unites

Call the Armenians
Come to America?

Movement to Bring Numbers of the Exiles to this Country—Consultation at "The Christian Herald" Offices—W. C. T. U. and the Salvation Army at Work.

DEEP and growing indignation is stirring the Christian nations over the Armenian question. No decided step has yet been taken by any government, however, and the Sultan and his advisers, in sheer contempt of Europe, have permitted and encouraged new outrages. Massacres are reported at different points in the interior and there are ominous evidences of a purpose on the part of the Mohammedans to repeat the horrors of last year, by slaughtering thousands of helpless Christians, unless action is taken by the Powers conjointly, or by some one strong fearless government in the interest of civilization and humanity, and regardless of all other consequences. That intervention will occur at no distant date is now generally expected.

Meanwhile Armenian refugees are flocking to European ports. There are in Marseilles at the present moment fully a hundred refugees. Miss Frances Willard and Lady Henry Somerset, who are still in that city, are at work trying to arrange for the emigration to the United States. Whether they will be permitted to come, or excluded under the present laws is yet undecided. The promoters of the plan are to enlist sufficient sympathy and support here in our official circles allow of the exiles being received, and also to establish colonies on new lands in the West, where they would be self-supporting agriculturists. On no account would they be allowed to remain in the cities, but would be shipped to their destination, in the colonies. Scattering groups of Armenians continue to arrive in New York. Those among them who are without friends, and practically helpless in a strange land, are sheltered at the cost of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund in a modest building on Third Avenue, New York, kept by an Armenian where meals and shelter are provided until such time as they can find employment, or leave the city to join Armenians settled elsewhere. A photograph of a group of these exiles standing in the doorway of this temporary shelter is given on this page. It is really a room of refuge for the moment, stopping there only a few days, others a week, and very few more than two or three weeks. They are in the care of an Armenian business man, who has lately devoted much of his time to the welfare of his unfortunate fellow-countrymen.

An important conference was held in the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the Bibb House, New York, a few days ago, at which the entire subject of Armenian immigration and colonization in the United States was discussed. There were present Commander Booth-Tucker and Mrs. Booth-Tucker of the Salvation Army, and Colonel Higgins and Lieutenant Lewis of the same organization; Dr. Bushnell and Mrs. Andrus, international delegates of the Women's Christian Temperance Union (of which Miss Frances E. Willard is President), Miss Mary Leitch, the well-known missionary of Ceylon, Rev. F. J. Greene, Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and G. H. Sandison, its Associate Editor. It was stated at the meeting that a cablegram had been received announcing that 150 Armenians were then on their way from a European port to New York, and requesting that provision be made for their reception here. This is probably the forerunner of a large Armenian immigration. At the conference in question it was arranged that the exiles, if properly admitted by the immigration officials at Ellis Island, could be sheltered temporarily at the Salvation Army's farm settlement near New York City, the cost of transportation and food during the period of their stay to be defrayed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund. The establishment of colonies at the West and South was also discussed and met with considerable favor, as this would remove the Armenians from the cities and from competition with labor, and would aid them in becoming self-supporting agriculturists in new and undeveloped sections of the country where they would be a welcome addition to the population. The present prospect is that the Salvation Army, the W. C. T. U., and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will co-operate harmoniously in any plans that may ultimately be adopted for the benefit of the exiles. Christian people everywhere in this country will be asked to help in such a movement, by finding employment, either in their own homes or in the homes of friends, for such of the exiles as are suited to domestic or farm labor. The others will be settled in colonies. Misses Mary and Margaret Leitch have renewed their generous offer of a gift of some 350 acres of fine farming land in Southern California (valued at $7,000) for a colony and other tenders of a like character are fully expected. The Conference closed with prayer, offered by Commander Booth.

Some Unusual
Private Charities.

ASSOCIATE Charity is a form of virtue that is of comparatively recent discovery, a newer and later revelation of the Gospel unto the poor and suffering. It is charity based on duty and principle; and administered with that method and regularity, which is the only security for the discharge of obligations of every kind. Indeed it is only by cooperative charity, that the poverty and suffering in large cities could be reached. It is true that the church in this manner loses all the picturesqueness of individual administration; but the church must move with the world. And she cannot therefore afford to rely on this method any more than the world can afford to go back to the poetic distaff, and the cottage loom.

Nevertheless individual charity is not to be abrogated. It is within everyone's power and duty; and in this respect, we may remember that sending a check to some Associate Charity, will not be accepted as a vicarious propitiation; and that at her work again. But this circumstance set the rich woman to investigating the number of poor women and men, who suffered in the same way, and who could not afford the fee for the skilled examination and the first cost of suitable glasses. She took upon herself the supplying of this want in her own locality; and though to give proper and effectual spectacles to poor ageing men and women does not appeal to our æsthetic tastes, it is really a noble charity—it is virtually to restore sight; to give work, to preserve self-respect, to prevent pauperism.

And I shall now venture to speak of another charity still less æsthetic in character, yet quite as essential to the welfare of many—I mean false teeth. The poor suffer from the decay and loss of teeth, even more than the rich. Their food is coarser, and not so easily digested; and the loss of teeth for proper mastication means, in their case, as well as in the case of the rich, chronic dyspepsia with all its physical and moral evil tendencies. In this respect also, one woman may feel for another woman in the simple loss of her good looks and pleasant expression. Such little things are great things! The love of a husband, the getting of a good place, the respect of neighbors, may possibly hang on just such a trifle as the replacing of lost teeth. If the oculist and dentist are necessary for the rich, they are much more so for the poor. Meat and money are not all: it is always better to create the conditions which make meat and money natural results.

I know of another lady who can always be relied on to give tonics to poor hard-worked women on the verge of nervous prostration. She was led to this charity by noticing the frequent quarrels in the house of a working man living near her. The couple had been noticeably happy, and she resolved to discover the cause of the change. She found it in the condition of the wife, who had worked and nursed until she was nervously worn out. Trembling and hysterical, ready to fly to pieces at a word, she was quite unable to control herself. Some phosphates, and iron, and nourishing food, restored the woman to herself; and peace and happiness to the whole family. This form of charity has been continued for years by the same person without notice, and without éclat; but only God can reckon the moral welfare, and domestic comfort which have been the result.

Women of wealth may always find poor women who need respectable clothing to get respectable work. They do not want the cast-off clothing of rich women, but one entire suit of decent garments suitable for the work they are fit for. Indeed, they need not limit their kindness to women; many a poor clerk has to take less wages, because of his shabby coat; for the tendency of human nature is always to rob the poor, because they are poor. But if people are honestly desirous of finding ways to imitate "Him who went about doing good," they can find them at every turn of every-day life. It is not necessary that Charity should be great or poetic; the gracious word, the decent garment, the aids to sight and health, the cup of warm tea, or of cold water, shall all go to profit, and not to loss.

We had better give too much than too little; even to the wayside beggar we may venture our dime, trusting that Charity will not miss her mark, though shooting at random. We may not be able, like Whitefield or Moody, to preach to thousands; but we can each, in our own locality, nourish the weak, clothe the naked, and succor those ready to perish, from such small every-day sorrows as I have indicated, for the little leak destroys the boat just as surely as the overwhelming waves. And God so often uses the smallest and humblest means; that we have every reason to believe these small unrecognized charities may prove the wicket gate leading to the Interpreter's House, and the Cross, and the Heavenly City, having for our encouragement this promise: "He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law"—yea, and the Gospel, too; for the "end of the Commandment is Charity out of a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith unfeigned."

the punishment of Dives, was mainly for not knowing the beggar at his gate. Now, both in the city, and in the country, the beggar is ever at our gate. There is always someone, with whom we can come in direct contact; upon whom we can lay our hands. This is a kind of charity that needs infinite tact and forbearance; it is troublesome and laborious; it exacts time, judgment, large sympathy, and self-denial. It is to exercise daily the highest of all the virtues, and such a duty cannot be lifted and laid down like a new novel. Associate charity must needs work in certain grooves, and by well-defined methods; but individual charity can seek out abnormal cases of suffering and do good in the by-ways of lowly life; and some of these unusual movements of really noble loving-kindness I am going to indicate.

Two years ago while visiting in Bury, Lancashire, I heard of a lady who gave nobly to a self-constituted charity of this kind. She went one day, after an absence of some months, to see a woman who had always done her fine sewing. She found her in great poverty. "I have lost my sight," she said pitifully, "and all my misery is in consequence of it." Her rich friend took her at once to an oculist, and so discovered that all she needed was a proper pair of spectacles. In a few days, the poor seamstress was singing happily

Another Kind of Election.

WHETHER in your day or mine there will be another style of political campaign. It will come as surely as that this world is to be Edenized and the crooked made straight. The candidates for aldermen, or sheriff, or governor, or legislature will be nominated, not in a dirty grogshop caucus, but in a place where a man can go without being nauseated by the malodor of whisky, onions, cabbage, and tobacco.

Among all good people in social life we have the rule that you should put the best construction upon a man's action, and if you cannot say something good of him, say nothing at all. That rule in the election of which I speak will be applied to the political campaign. We will take our candidate and extol all his better qualities. We will have a picture of him in his best moods, and a biography bringing out all the noble deeds of his life. When we speak of the opposing candidate, we will admit all his excellencies, but compare the two men and say our man is the better. Our platform speeches and our newspaper columns will have nothing that sounds and reads like billingsgate or rancor. On election day if the wind blows from the northeast, and we feel chilled by standing at the polls, we will have a hot lemonade or mocha. A man will be as moral and pure on election day as on sacramental day. If nothing is involved in the election but the question who shall have official position, instead of standing in a political meeting haranguing the audience by the hour upon questions not at all involved, we will come out on the platform and practically say: "Gentlemen, this is a very important election, because it decides the question of a livelihood for a great many people. There is the Mayor's salary of so many thousand dollars, and the District Attorney's salary of so many thousand, and the President's salary of so many thousand, and we have a great many these men now in office have had emoluments. I have myself my eye on an office, and although I am not a candidate on the ticket under the administration, and that will be very hard upon me, I want the lawful salary for some good position. Some of these men in office have had opportunity not only of beautiful children and some relatives dependent upon my success, and I tell you plainly that my reason for being on this platform to-night is not because I am afraid the American eagle will be shot in her sublime flight, but because I want and the presiding officer of this meeting wants, and all the vice-presidents of the meeting want, and the committee who got up the meeting want, and many of the gentlemen who clap their hands at the eloquence of the speakers want, a good honest living for hard work done in the service of the city and country." There will be no hypocrisy in that and nothing wrong in that. If a man get $2,000 or $5,000 or $10,000 salary in the public service it is just as honorable as though he got it by selling dry goods or sawing logs. The ideal electioneering campaign of which I speak may be very distant, but so far as you and I are concerned we may ourselves practice it. Remember, that an election lie is as bad as any other lie, and that slander in November is as bad as slander in June.

But few men come out of the ordeal of city or State or national politics as good as when they went in. But I cannot help sympathizing with the disappointed people who have already failed to get nomination and the many others who in a few days will be disappointed by non-election. For every position there are at least 100 applicants. Hence, of necessity, ninety-nine applicants are or will be disappointed. By an inexorable law we cannot have more than six Presidents in a single generation.

If you have a mission in public affairs advance confidently. Whatever our hands find to do in any department of civic or religious duty, let us do it, and that quickly, or we will never do it at all. Napoleon said that the Austrians failed at Rivoli because they did not know the value of ten minutes. I have known men who in some crisis of life where great responsibilities converged lost two worlds—earth and heaven—because they did not know the value of one minute.

FAC-SIMILE OF DR. GRACE KIMBALL'S LETTER OF THANKS.

Dr. Grace Kimball's letter is as follows:

LOUIS KLOPSCH, Esq., Proprietor, Christian Herald, New York.

DEAR MR. KLOPSCH: Will you allow me the pleasure of making it one of my first duties on my return to the United States, to thank you, and through you your readers for the noble and generous way in which they came to the relief of distress in Armenia. I wish you would extend to each contributor (be his contribution large or small) my own sincere, personal thanks, and the blessings and benedictions of the many thousand suffering Armenian fellow Christians, who by their generosity were kept from experiencing the pangs of starvation. Those blessed words "I was an hungered and ye gave me bread" often become in a way trite to our Gospelized ears; but to one who has seen as I have, the tears of joy of father or mother as bread was put into the hands of their famishing children, the realness of the reward to those who gave the bread can never be doubted. And the beauty and worth of the interest and generosity you and your co-workers and your readers have shown, is wonderful to me inasmuch as not having

BRIEF NOTES.

The Zenana Bible and Medical Mission employs 122 Europeans, 175 Christian teachers, a 70 Bible-women.

A Boys' Republic on the Plan of Mr. W. R. George, which has been fully described in previous articles in this journal, has been founded at Villa, Ill.

An Effort is Being Made by Mr. Loomis the American Bible Society's agent in Japan, to procure a copy of the Bible in Japanese in each of the thirty thousand dwellings of Nazoya.

Charles Inglis, the English Evangelist, will spend the winter in the United States. After six weeks work in the east he hopes to begin his west about January 1st. Letters may be addressed to him at this office.

Evangelist Arthur Crane, Assisted by the Gospel Singer, Mr. Hugh A. McLean, is conducting Gospel services at Elizabeth, N. J. He expects to go from there to Norfolk, Va., where a series of united meetings are to be held.

Reports from Macedonia, la., Describe a successful series of meetings conducted by Rev. Edwin H. Baker and W. L. Anderson. Many conversions occurred and the churches of the west were quickened with spiritual life.

Pastor Chiniquy, in spite of his advanced age, is undertaking a six months' preaching tour in England in connection with the Protestant Alliance. He was welcomed in London by a reception at the National Club on Sept. 23d.

The Congregational Church in England is gaining at the expense of the Methodists. The leading pulpits of London Congregational churches are now filled by ex-Wesleyan ministers. The Highbury Quadrant, Dr. Allon's old church in Westminster chapel.

Throughout the Summer the Presbyterian Endeavorers of Glendon, Penn., have been holding weekly open-air Gospel services, with an average attendance of three hundred persons. Scores of other Christian Endeavor societies have been engaged in similar work.

Mrs. A. E. W. Robertson, Who is laboring among the Indians in the Indian Territory has completed a translation of the Book of Psalms in the Muskogee language, which she has asked the American Bible Society to have printed for circulation among the people of that tribe.

Some Important Concessions Have been made by the New Zealand Government to the Christian Army. Permission has been granted to officers to visit the jails of the colony, and in addition to this the old Immigration Barracks in Auckland have been placed at the Army's disposal for social purposes.

The Directors of the American Congregational Association have appointed a committee of five to procure plans for the new Congregational House in Boston. The building will be a two-story steel frame structure of the highest order, monumental in character, a credit to the city and the denomination.

The Pathetic Death is Announced of Miss Emma Entwistle, a young missionary in the service of Si Chua, China. She remained at her post during an outbreak of small-pox. She labored all through the epidemic, attending to the sick and consoling the survivors, but at the last caught the disease and died. She was to have been married soon. Her death is sincerely deplored.

The Teachers and Officers of the Christian School of the German Reformed Dutch Church of New York passed a formal resolution at their meeting expressing sincere thanks to Dr. Louis Klopsch for the privilege extended to the children of the school of spending a holiday at the Children's Home at Nyack and for the care bestowed upon them while there.

The Chautauqua Reading Circle is widening the scope of its four years' plan by the introduction of this year of French History. What is called the French-Greek year opens up a most attractive field for the student. The books are all prepared by specialists who are not only fully acquainted with the subjects but have skill in presenting them in an attractive manner.

At the Suggestion of Dr. F. E. Clarke the Christian Endeavor Societies will unite with the Societies in Great Britain, in a week of prayer for Armenia. The second week in November has been agreed upon, and a cable message has been sent to Dr. Clark who was in Scotland when he made the suggestion, heartily pledging the acquiescence of the American Societies.

Many Hundred Poor Families in New York will mourn the death of "Mother" Sherwood for twenty years past has given her time, labor and money unceasingly to their service in the name of Christ. She was sixty-five years of age and a sister of ex-Governor Phineas Lounsbury, a neophyte. Her quiet, unostentatious, Christlike helpfulness was a blessing to the whole city.

The Fiftieth Anniversary of the American Missionary Association, which has been celebrated for the evangelization of the colored race, was celebrated in Boston, October 20 to 22, 1906. The addresses of welcome will be delivered on Tuesday afternoon, October 23, by Governor of Wolcott, Mayor Quincy, and Rev. E. S. Henshaw, D. D. The sermon will be preached by Rev. L. Abbott.

The Preliminary Programme of the fifth annual meeting of the Baptist Congress, to be held in Nashville, Tenn., November 10th-14th, has been issued. The topics to be discussed are: "The New Testament Precedent for the Union of Divine Commandments," "Christianity and War," "Problems of the Country Church," "Is God the Father of All Men?" "The Relation of Baptists to Other Denominations" and "The Pastor a Soul Winner."

Mr. Rutnam, the Young Hindu Christian preacher, held meetings in Toronto and Hamilton, Can. He also visited other points. He is greeted with large audiences in both cities. On Thursday, 10th, Sept., had a crowd of 100 at Cook's Presbyterian Church, the largest Protestant church in Canada. He gave his sermon on "The Marvellous India," and his descriptions of the land were very interesting and thoroughly enjoyed. He returns to his studies in Princeton, the well-wishes of many Canadian friends, and earnest invitations to return and resume his labors in that country at Christmas vacation.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Turkey's Mentors.

WARNING of European intervention has, according to recent cable dispatches, been given to the Sultan by M. Cambon, the French Ambassador at Constantinople. With the unanimous support of the representatives of Russia, Germany, Austria, Italy and England, M. Cambon urged the Sultan that the recent outbreak of anarchy in Constantinople had created "uneasiness" in Europe, and demanded that a repetition of the disorders would lead to European intervention. In diplomatic language, he advised the Sultan to behave himself, if he wished to keep his throne. Doubtless, the Sultan knew how to interpret the studied moderation of an Ambassador's courtly phrases, and is perfectly well aware that it is something more than uneasiness that his diabolical intrigues have aroused in Europe. The unanimity of the foreign Ambassadors might, however, have been a disagreeable surprise to him. Hitherto, his safety has been secured by the mutual jealousies of these gentlemen and of the governments they represent. He knew that English interference would not be tolerated by France and Russia, and that any move of Russia would provoke the opposition of England and possibly Germany and Austria. So long as the protection of England and France alone kept him from being swallowed up by his northern enemy, he was inclined to keep on good terms with his protectors; but since France has transferred her friendship from England to Russia, he has realized that the English alliance is not worth the price it cost him in his behaviour. In the new grouping of the powers England stood alone and there was no longer any need to consult susceptibilities, by putting a restraint on his bloodthirsty propensities. He had nothing to fear from her while France and Russia distrusted her and he could count on the indifference of Germany, Austria and Italy. England could not punish him without the assent of the other powers, nor was any other power likely to undertake the task. The Sultan felt himself safe in this mutual distrust and must have been alarmed when he learned that the Ambassadors were unanimously agreed in supporting M. Cambon's warning. There is nothing he has so much reason to dread as such an agreement which, whatever else it may take, must operate to the prejudice of his interests. It may be said, in the interest of the peoples whom Turkey has so long oppressed, that the unanimity of the Ambassadors may be maintained and that the powers they represent may unite in abolishing the rule of the oppressor. So may the warning of God's Word be fulfilled:

The eyes of the Lord God are upon the sinful nation, and he will destroy it from off the face of the earth. Amos 9:8.

Haessing the Enemy.

A singular instance of a dangerous element being turned into useful service is given by a mining journal. It appears that at a Comstock silver mine lode, in spite of being in a mountainous district, the miners were continually being troubled with the influx of water. A mining engineer suggested that if a tunnel were driven through the hill the mines would be drained. The tunnel was accordingly made and it completely effected the purpose. The water drawn from the mines flowed through the tunnel. Then a new idea occurred to the engineers. A chamber was excavated in the bottom of the mine, 1700 feet below the surface and a shaft was sunk to it from the tunnel. The water from the hill rushing down the shaft was directed through nozzles against several Pelton wheels which have small buckets attached to their outer edge. The stream filling the buckets turns the wheels and thus power is obtained which is sufficient to drive electric generators. These, in turn, by an electric cable, drive electric motors and in this way all steam machinery has been dispensed with and the heavy cost of fuel saved. Thus instead of the company having at a great expense to keep the mines clear of water by pumping, it now uses the the downward track. Thomas Jones, who had charge of the cars, knew that fifteen men were working on the track below, and unmindful of the danger to himself, he ran forward and shouted a warning to them. The rope tightened suddenly, before he could get out of the way. It struck him on the back, killing him instantly. The men at the bottom all escaped injury. But for Jones's warning, they must have all been killed. Happily they heeded it and his life was not sacrificed in vain. They did not act as some do who are in danger of eternal death and who, though Christ died to save them, pay no attention to the warning.

The preaching of the Gospel is the best antidote to selfishness. 1 Cor. 13:3.

A Hero on the Locomotive.

A daring rescue was effected on Sept. 26 by a fireman of an engine on the Northern New Jersey Railroad. The man, whose name is Charles Williams, is a big, strong fellow in the prime of life. He was at work on his engine that morning when it was approaching the Bergen tunnel about two miles out from Jersey City. The tracks of the Erie Road at that place lie side by side with the Northern. Looking out of the window of his cab, he saw a woman on the track another. Yet how many listen unmoved to the story of him who laid down his life to save them from everlasting destruction!

For scarcely for a righteous man will die; yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. But... while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Rom. 5:7, 8.

Braving the Dromedary.

A surprising spectacle was witnessed in Central Park, New York, a few days ago. Among the animals in the menagerie there is a dromedary which has been for nearly a year past the terror of all the keepers. It was separated from its mate last fall, and it seemed to resent its loss. It became sulky, and finally had fits of savage ferocity that made it dangerous to approach it. The keepers had as much dread in going near its cage as they had of the Nubian lion. Among the visitors last week, were three Arabs dressed in red and yellow turbans, baggy red trousers, blue stockings, and brilliant red sashes. They took a lively interest in the animals, some of which they had apparently never seen before. When they came to the dromedary's enclosure, the animal was snorting as usual and in a vicious mood. One of the Arabs stepped lightly on the fence and dropped inside the enclosure a few feet from the dromedary. The angry animal seemed astonished at the visitor, and peered curiously at the representative of a race which has driven the ships of the desert for centuries. The keepers called to the man to come away, if he did not want to be killed; but the Arab was not alarmed. He uttered some words in his native tongue to the dromedary which had a soothing effect on the furious beast. Then he spoke to it in a tone of command, and to the amazement of the keepers, the dromedary followed him around the enclosure as meekly as a lamb. The dromedary had evidently been trained to obey, and was ready to obey when addressed in tones that it could understand. It is the same with Christian people who have the spirit of the Lord. The world calls them cranks, and wonders at their scruples and their obstinacy, but when they recognize the voice of their Lord, they are meek and obedient.

The sheep follow him: for they know his voice, and a stranger will they not follow. (John 10: 4.)

Why the Building Collapsed.

A half-finished five-story flat-house in Madison avenue, New York, collapsed suddenly a few days ago, killing one man and injuring nine others. Happily, the front wall had not been carried up beyond the second story, so the injuries were confined to the workmen inside the building, on whom the rear and side walls fell. When the building department's inspectors arrived to examine the ruin, they found that the walls had been of brick, veneered with dressed stone. The mortar was little better than mud, and the bricks came out of it clean, and could be lifted off with the hands.

Badly built, however, as the walls were, they might not have collapsed for some time if the foundations had been properly laid. They were of stone, and rested on a bed of sand which had once been the bottom of a stream. The inspectors said that at the place where the rear wall stood the excavation for the foundation ought to have been carried down thirty feet, to reach ground sufficiently solid to support the wall of a five-story house; but the contractor had not dug lower than six feet and had laid his lowest tier of stone in the sand. Perhaps if he had expected to live in the house he would have been more careful as to its safety. Men do not often risk their own lives in that heedless way. There are many, however, who commit the far worse blunder of putting their souls in peril through building on a false foundation. They rest their hopes of salvation on their morality, or their good works, or on their baptism, or confirmation or church membership, forgetting that on Christ alone they must depend.

Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. 1 Cor. 3: 11.

water that was so difficult to get rid of, to do the work of the mines. Something like this has happened at times in the experience of Christians. The things which seemed untoward and unfortunate have turned to the benefit of Christ's cause.

The things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the Gospel. (Phil. 1: 12.)

A Warning Saves Lives.

Fifteen men working in a pit at Wilkes-barre, Pa., belonging to the Kingston Coal Company escaped death or serious injury on Oct. 2, through the heroism of a workman. He was superintending the operations on the planes, where the trucks bring up the coal. There is a double track there and an arrangement of a rope and pulley, by which the momentum of a train of loaded cars is used to pull a train of empty cars up a slope. The empty cars had reached the top of the slope, when in some way not explained, one of them became detached and ran swiftly down. At the foot, it struck several cars to which the rope was attached, starting them on walking deliberately in front of his engine. She saw the train coming and stepped out of its way, on to the tracks of the Erie. But she did not see that a west bound Erie express was emerging from the tunnel behind her and coming down upon her at a speed of thirty miles an hour. She had stepped out of the way of the slow train right into the path of the fast train. The noise of both trains was in her ears, but she saw only one. A horrible death seemed inevitable. Calling to the engineer to slow up to give him a chance to save her, Wilkins ran to the step of the cab. As he came almost level with her, he jumped and recovering his footing with a celerity truly marvelous, he was quickly at her side. His strong arms were thrown around her and she was lifted bodily to the strip of clear sand beyond the tracks. In a moment the Erie train thundered past. Leaving the woman he had saved, he ran back across the Erie tracks just in time to swing himself on board the last car of his own train, which had slowed up for his leap. We rightly honor a man who would thus imperil his own life to save that of

The Mind of the Master.

A Sermon Preached at Hampstead, England, by Rev. R. F. Horton, D.D., Text: Phil. 2: 5:
Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ.

HERE will only be time to-day for me to refer to a few of the great truths which occur in the teaching of our Lord, and which have not been maintained, at any rate, in the right place in the usual teaching of the Christian Church. I shall just touch upon this as briefly as possible, only reminding you that there are many others of the same kind. Now, I will say a word first about this truth that the Fatherhood is the final idea of God; the truth that God is the Father of every human being. Dr. Watson says very beautifully in his work, "The Mind of the Master," in speaking about the Old Testament, the Psalmists, and the Prophets, that they did not understand this truth, they did not know it. "It is not," he says, "a refusal to say Father, because the idea is an offence; it is an unconsciousness—because the idea has not yet dawned. The clouds which have gradually risen from the base and sides of the doctrine of God still veil the summit." And the great central idea of our Lord Jesus Christ is that he unfolds the summit of the idea of God. It is his great central truth that he shows God as the Father of man. "No man knows the Father," he says, "but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him," and this notion all along was that he was in the world, that the world might see the Father—his Father, the world's Father.

The Father of Men.

Of course he never proceeds by the method of dogmatic assertions upon the subject of the Fatherhood. It is not the method of our Lord Jesus Christ to dispute and argue upon religious questions. His purpose seems to be not so much to get men to believe as to perceive the Father who is God, and accordingly he summons men to himself, convinced that if they would come to him they will see God is their Father, and the Father of all; and that is what has happened, and is happening to-day.

Coming to him we verily find it is as he says. Looking at the world through his eyes, making allowance for the numberless sayings of his which at first might seem to tell in the opposite direction, bringing all his sayings to a focus, trying to see exactly as he sees, we reach the astounding conclusion that all human beings, literally all are the children of God, lost children some of them may be, ignorant children most of them are, rebellious children a great number insist on being, but still they are children, the children of God. For when in the great chapter, the 15th of Luke, our Master was rebuked because he would consort with sinners, his defence was of the kind you all remember: "Do you object to these sinners?" He said, "To me they appear like sheep that have wandered from the fold, like good money lost out of the purse, like the son that had left the Father's house." That torn and stained thing is a sheep still, and a sheep from the fold; and the piece of money, though it is lost and no man can tell where it is, is a piece of money still, and when it is found it will be the money's worth just the same; and the foolish boy in the rags, there among the swine, is not a swine, but a man, and a son of the Father still.

Now it is not astonishing that the world has found it very difficult to grapple with the thought of Jesus. They have hesitated to believe and to apply it. It seems, as it were, more reverent to deny, to repudiate the Fatherhood of God in relation to the human race, than to accept it. You think it is a great deal more reverent to deny the Fatherhood of God than to accept it.

atics pounding their brothers to death, no children of God. We suppose that we are vindicating the character of our Father by denying the childhood of his children. The Church as a whole has never seriously grasped the great thought. She has always taken the Fatherhood into her own hands, and disposed of it according to her taste. You, there, accepting my dogmas, you, there, baptised at my font, are the children of God; but you, unhappy, unbaptized heathen, miserable sectary and schismatic, you are not the children of God. And, therefore to-day, even after all these centuries, it savors of heresy for anyone to say in

The Broad Way of Jesus,

"He is Father of all human beings." But oh, brothers and sisters, children of the Father, how it changes all your view of life, and all your view of men if you seriously accept the teaching of Jesus. You look out upon these men around you. They may be wicked, ignorant, atheistic; so much more sorrow over them, so much more loving effort to recover them. They may be even, by a fatal misbirth, born again, as it were, into the childhood of the devil, and being by their perverted choice children of the devil; but you cannot alter your great faith for such appearances as these. The Son of man is manifested to destroy the works of the devil, and to recover those who are made captive at his will. And you take the very worst and most hopeless of your kind, and with unswerving faith you say, "He is a child of God." It is a sorrow that it is a child of God who has sunk to this, and defiled the heart that came from the heart of God.

The Meaning of the Cross.

But let me touch for a moment upon another of these great truths which Jesus taught which we are slow to understand. I refer to the meaning of the Cross. Now, it is a great stumbling-block to many people—the teaching of the Cross. To the men of the first age it was the Cross that was the stumbling-block; to the men of our age it is the teaching about the Cross that is the stumbling-block. The difficulty appears in the doctrine of the Atonement, as it is called. It seems to many minds somewhat arbitrary, somewhat unjust, in some forms of its statement; it seems remote from experience; it is abstract. But it is not in the words and teaching of Jesus exposed to any of these objections. The difficulty all came from the attempt to compare the truth of the Cross with the Jewish conception of sacrifice. Look at the teaching of Jesus upon this subject, and you find that he moves along the simplest and the plainest lines, in which everyone can follow him. One might almost summarise it in a sentence. He puts it thus: If a man loves men absolutely, he will lay down his life for them; and if men are very bad and sinful, they will in their blindness and ignorance kill the very man who loves them. "And I love men," he says, "and men will slay me, and then men come to understand; and as they see I loved them, and as they see their sins have slain me, they will hate the sins that slew me, and will have them crucified to my Cross." Theology has taken the whole conception up into the arid and barren region of the intellect, and there exposed it to the pitiless criticism of the arid and barren intellect. But Jesus kept it in the higher region of the heart, of the passion for purity, and of the quick response which every human heart makes to a love that will die for it.

The Ageless Life

Or I might touch upon another of his great thoughts. To what Dr. Watson calls the "Ageless Life." It is the teaching of Jesus which has been perverted, which has been constantly treated as if he referred to a future world, when all the time the Lord Jesus was speaking about a present life, a life which he calls the ageless life, a life which is not bound by the world but above it, and his thought always was, "Though I know the world unseen, though I myself am the revelation of it, yet I do not talk about it, I do not satisfy your curiosity upon the subject. I am not here, strictly speaking, to tell you about the world to come, I am here to bring into this world a life that is a life indeed, the ageless life. He that believeth on me hath this life." And it is very important to see and to understand that wonderful meaning of Jesus, because undoubtedly the reason as we call it to-day, is that they are always thinking of salvation as something which refers to the world to come, while Jesus thinks of it as something here. There is thus a striking contrast between the conception of life produced by the misunderstanding of Jesus, and the conception of life which follows from our Lord saying what he means.

Why Men are not Saved,

Upon the subject of ageless life you remember how history records that the great Emperor Charles V., in the middle of the sixteenth century resigned the Imperial throne while he was yet in the comparative prime of life, that he might give himself to fasting and prayer in a Spanish monastery for the rest of his days and so secure Heaven. Now, in contrast of that which is a misunderstanding of the thought of Jesus, there is the familiar story of the Puritan fathers of the United States, who were assembled in the Senate House at mid-day when a sudden darkness veiled the sky, and no man could see his brother's face. There was confusion and fear, and several murmured along the benches of the House, "It must be the Day of Judgment come," and then presently one man arose and said, "Whether it be the Judgment Day or no, I know not, but this I know, that it is God's will we save our country, and we shall be judged accordingly. I move that the candles be lit, and we go on with our business." That was the spirit of Jesus; that was the way in which he applied religious truth. He would not have you say, "Lo! here and Lo! there," searching into the dim future which is not to be revealed, but he would have you understand the Kingdom of God is within you, and our business is to go about the duties which the Kingdom enjoins. Blessed is that servant whom the Lord when he comes finds doing what? Speculating, constructing schemes? No, doing the daily humble task which the Lord has set him.

The Kingdom of God.

But now that leads me to mention the last which there is time to discuss of the great thoughts of the teaching of Jesus which the world has been slow to apprehend, that idea which fills so large a place in the words of Jesus, and so insignificant a place in the teaching of the Church—the Kingdom of God. It was a saying of the great Italian patriot, Mazzini, "The first real faith that shall arise upon the ruins of the old worn-out creeds will transform the whole of our actual social organization, because the whole history of humanity is but the repetition in form and degree of the Christian prayer, 'Thy Kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven.'" Will you allow me to point out the significance of this saying? You will admit that Mazzini was among the greatest of nineteenth century men, one of the few men who deserve the great name of prophet; a man who in the midst of confusion kept his head high and knew that the great and good time was coming for his nation and for the world. Now, has it ever struck you how significant it is that the greatest patriot and political thinker of the nineteenth century should find that all his ideas are summed up in a single brief sentence from the words of Jesus, that he sees it all in the paragraph from the Lord's prayer, "Thy Kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven"? Is not that the justification of the truth that the ages will not get beyond our Master, and if there is a three thousandth century, they will still be using some words of his?

May I just in closing suggest two or three indications of what is meant by the Kingdom of God? I have no time to enter into detail, but let me recall your mind to this:

Jesus was always speaking about the Kingdom of God. It was by speaking about the Kingdom of God that he put the treasures of this world in their right place, took the absolutely true view of what we call wealth, gave it the name of mammon, told us that we could not serve God and mammon too. Through his absolute apprehension of the Kingdom of God, the Lord saw the mighty picture of the rich man and Lazarus, and turned away contemptuously from a paltry person who wished to obey him, the Saviour of the world, in giving his miserable inheritance divided between him and his brother. It was through understanding the Kingdom of God that he found himself in sympathy with people of all kinds and all creeds; it was through understanding the Kingdom of God that he took that high tone in reference to what we called politics. He would have nothing to do with what were called politics, that is, the great question who is to govern. But that that is unimportant in its place in the light of the Kingdom of God all the questions of politics are quite subordinate. The great point is: Shall God reign? And the second point is: What method of government will get his reign established on earth?

It is through the apprehension of the Kingdom of God that the Lord Jesus Christ is so intensely interested in every individual—never loses sight of the person in the multitude. And it is through apprehension of what each person is meant to be, that each person may become, that he come to the glorious thought of the Kingdom of God. When a man grasps the Kingdom of God as Jesus presents it, he goes on to work for men full of life.

Full of Renunciation, full of humility, refusing to judge others. He works by the way of the cross, because that is the way of the Kingdom of God. There are many empires on the earth to-day, but none is so dominant as the Kingdom of God. It is a blessed truth. According to the conception of Jesus, that Kingdom of God works through all the abominations of Turkey. It is more beautiful to us every year, and we are beginning to grasp with a passionate love, and to say as we never used to say, "Oh Father in heaven, let thy Kingdom come: let thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

But let me remind you that the Kingdom of God as Jesus described it is con- quering, is upon the earth, is growing, and is to conquer. A few months ago in that fiendish massacre at Urfa, when the Turks had butchered and burned the thousand helpless persons in the great church, they mockingly cried to Christ. They cried to him now to prove himself a greater prophet than Mohammed, and surely the cry was answered there and then. The proof was there for all to see—those helpless souls perishing because they would not deny their Lord were Christians, they were there perishing for Christ, and Christ was with them, and those evil devils defying, marauding, destroying, were the disciples of Mohammed. They were in Mohammed's name, shouting the name of their prophet over their deaf lust and blood. And in heaven a Christ listens, and the horrified earth says, "There is no greater proof, no more needed." But our Christ is a greater prophet than Mohammed. The Kingdom of God, like its founder, achieves its victories by the Cross, by patient suffering and sacrifice, by praying for the sav- ing who know not what they do.

And now as we close let us remember that hardly anyone has yet understood the mind of the Master. We are all scholars in that school, and most of us are still in the first standard of the school, and we know no one who has passed out in the seventh standard. We are all scholars in that school, and you, I trust, each man of you, tries to understand the mind of the Master for your daily life, for your holiness, for your work, for your country, for the world. There is no country which has been ordered and governed by the mind of the Master, no continent has shaped its policy according to that rule—"Thy Kingdom come." As Mr. Ruskin has so forcibly said, "When you pray 'thy kingdom come,' you either want it to come or you don't. If you don't you should not pray for it. If you do you must do more than pray for it, you must live for it, and lay out for the Kingdom of God." May God's will be done upon earth as it is in heaven.

THE BOWERY'S GOSPEL LIGHT-HOUSE.

New Superintendent and his Assistant Already at Work, and Keeping the Lamps Trimmed and Burning—A Beacon for Moral Shipwrecks.

ALTHOUGH only a few days have passed since the installation of the new Superintendent of the Bowery Mission, Mr. J. H. Wyburn and his Assistant, Mr. Mershon (as briefly mentioned in our issue of last week), the result of the appointments is already felt in the new spirit that has been given to the spiritual part of the work at the Mission. All week-day evening services are largely attended, and the meetings on Sunday last were as fervent and deeply spiritual as any in the long history of the grand old mission. Especially was this the case at the Converts' Prayer Meeting on Sunday afternoon, when a great number of converts from every quarter of the Union, were presented as subjects of special supplication.

owing to the limited space at our disposal last week, the services at the formal installation of Messrs. Wyburn and Mershon were only briefly referred to. These services were extremely interesting. The gathering was a representative one, and the speeches were of a character to encourage the new incumbents to energetic performance of the work under their charge. In introducing them, Dr. Louis Klopsch spoke as follows:

In the eloquent prayer that has just been offered up, the "Bowery Mission" was duly designated as a Gospel light-house. Situated on one of the greatest thoroughfares of the greatest city of the greatest country in all the world, may it ever prove to be a Gospel light-house and a haven of rest to every homeless, friendless and sick soul, and may it, under the blessing of the Almighty, be the means of delivering countless thousands from the enslavement of appetite and passion, and lead them to that blessed Saviour whose salvation is world-wide, and whose praise is "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out."

I am especially thankful this evening while the Bowery Mission is a great agency for good in this its peculiar field, it is at the same time, through these waters and other workers who have gone out to spread the good tidings abroad, exerting a blessed influence in other sections of this country, and the fire burning so brightly will help to light torches elsewhere, and set many hearts aglow with zeal in the service of our Lord.

To-night it is my privilege to introduce to you our new Superintendent, Brother Wyburn. When I first sent for him and communicated my intention of making him the Superintendent of this great work, Brother Wyburn hesitated somewhat, but after a few days he came and told me that a careful consideration of the subject had led him to decide to accept the call, because he believed that he could gather in a large harvest of souls, and as he told me this, I said in my heart "this is the kind of man we want in the Bowery Mission."

And now, Brother Wyburn, I place into your hands this great trust. May God graciously bless the Bowery Mission as ever before, and bless you in your every effort in its behalf. May, through your gentle, kind, sympathetic and loving ministrations, multitudes be brought to Christ; and I charge you solemnly to see to it that the lamps of this light-house are kept trimmed and burning, in order that it may be the means of lighting many a shipwrecked mariner on the sea of life to the haven of safety and to life everlasting. You will be assisted in this work by Brother Talmage Mershon, who is a new recruit of Dr. Talmage. May he prove worthy of the name, and while his illustrious uncle is preaching the Gospel to countless multitudes and turning many to Christ, may his nephew here pick hand-picked fruit for the Master, and "show himself a workman approved of God that needeth not to be ashamed." It is a great responsibility which I now place in your hands, and may God bless you, and may the Holy Spirit help you to acquit yourself acceptably in his sight."

Mr. Wyburn, the new Superintendent, made the following response:

I am glad to see so many of my friends here. In accepting the responsibility of this work, I did it with a good deal of hesitation. For years it has been my desire to see a mission on the Bowery, run just as we run our work in Water street. Our work down there is a peculiar one; our meetings are very quiet, and yet the Spirit of God is with us constantly. I realize that the Spirit of God is working in this place; I have always felt that one of the ambitions of my life was to work on the Bowery and I accept this responsibility; I have prayed over the matter quite a good deal, and every time that I have prayed, God has seemed to put it more and more on my heart, and so I am glad to-night that I am here; glad that the Spirit of God has led me into this work.

I want specially to speak to-night to the converts of this mission; I want you to rally around me, boys. This is the second time that I ever have had the privilege of speaking in this place; I want you to become acquainted with me; it will afford me a good deal of satisfaction to know the converts of the Bowery Mission.

Eight years ago to-night I was led by the Spirit of God into the McAuley Mission; I never expected while I was on my way there that I was going to a mission; never thought for a moment that I should ever enter the doors of a mission, because I was an atheist; had very little use for religion. A friend of mine sent me with a letter to Brother Hadley. I was told by the converts of the work and the way that Christ Jesus had come into their lives. I had often heard sermons; I suppose I have heard the most gifted men of the present day, but they did not touch my heart. I believe in a living Saviour, who comes into the lives and the hearts of the people. I shall never forget the things that led up to it. About a month prior to that, I had been an inmate of a Christian Home on the corner of Eighty-sixth St. and there I heard the wonderful story of Jesus and his love; it was simply like pouring water on a duck's back, as far as my life was concerned. That night, in Water St. Mission, men got up there and said that they were saved, through the precious blood of Jesus Christ, and from that moment up to the present time I have been looking upward—looking to Jesus. I praise him to-night for his wonderful goodness to me; if I was to stand here till to-morrow morning and talk, I could never tell you what a difference it has made in my life; Jesus became my Saviour, my Redeemer.

As I look back at the condition I was in that night, and then just take a look at myself to-night, it is wonderful! The love and the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ coming into my heart and into my life. I shall never forget, as I went up to the penitent seat and looked up into the faces of Brother Bernard and Brother Hadley; I was told to pray, "God be merciful to me, a sinner," and God heard and answered my prayer; I was just on the verge of delirium; I had been drinking very hard and I had tried often and often to stop it, but this night Jesus Christ did the thing that nobody else could do; the old chains which had bound me for so many years—the chains were broken.

While Brother Corfield was reading the Scripture lesson, it struck me, if God could come into your hearts and your lives, by his wonderful power your life can be changed; God grant that some one in this room will start to-night. I am glad, my dear friends, that I have the blessed privilege of coming into this work in the Bowery Mission.

Mr. Mershon, the new Assistant Superintendent said:

My heart is very full to-night, and I feel very thankful to God, that he, in his infinite mercy and love, saved me, and has brought me here to stand as I do to-night, an assistant in this work. Christ said, "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me." I want to say to-night, that it will be my meat and my flesh to do the will of my master. About ten days ago, I received a note from my dear brother, Dr. Klopsch, asking me to "come to this city"; it was late in the afternoon when I read his letter. I hastened over to the telephone, asked the proprietor as to whether I could leave. I said, "if the Lord calls me I will go." He said, "how about the wife?" I said, "we are one in Christ." On reaching home that evening, my wife (having read the letter) said to me "are you going?" I replied, "most certainly." I journeyed on to the Bowery, and to you my brothers, I want to tell you, that you will always find me at any time of the day or night, if I can be of any assistance to you, in leading you to that Christ in whom I found peace. I will always be glad to do what I can for you, and Brother Wyburn knows, that he will always find me ready to help. I trust that I may be able to work in this part of the city, and that we, as a band of people, may be the means of leading many to Christ, seeing many flocking to Christ, and crying, "what must I do to be saved?"

Rev. Stephen Merritt being asked to speak, responded briefly in these terms:

I have not felt as much at home in years as I have felt to-night. Forty-five years, one month and twenty-three days ago, I was led out of my bondage of sin into the liberty of

Mrs. Whittemore, founder of the "Door of Hope," said:

I will just take but one little moment or so, just simply to give out a thought that came to my heart. In the beginning of this meeting, something was said about the Light-House here in the Bowery. I just want to bring that precious light before you to-night; never have I had more need of the light than I have at this present moment, and to his glory I can truthfully say, that never has the light burned in my heart brighter than to-night; the same Jesus, yesterday, to-day, and forever, the wonder-working Jesus! There will be very much need here in this place, after to-night, through the ministry of prayer, to hold your dear leader very close to God. You dear boys here, you have given your hearts to God, keep in close touch with the light yourself, and through the ministry of prayer keep your leaders very close to God. Breathe it out into your hearts, and so one and all, be co-workers for God. I do love my precious Lord, and the desire within my heart is to know him and do his bidding. Glory be to God!

Mr. S. H. Hadley, of the Water Street Mission, also spoke, wishing Brother Wyburn god-speed, on his eighth anniversary. He had been present at the conversion of Mr. Wyburn in Water street. He added: "I can only say, God bless him! and he will have our prayers and our love, and I believe that God is going to reward him here in this work. I see in this hall to-night, men who need so much to start for the Kingdom. Fourteen years, two months, and five nights ago to-night, Jesus touched my heart. In one moment's time, I ceased to be a drunkard, a gambler, everything that is vile, and salvation has flowed like a river, and my life from that time until now has been a glorious summer day, and is it any wonder that I want people to know Jesus Christ?"

Mr. Charles Bernard also spoke briefly. Of Mr. Wyburn, he said: "I know those who have had the mission in charge have placed it in the hands of a man who loves the Lord Jesus Christ. I congratulate you, Brother, and I pray that this place may re-echo with testimonies of those who will be saved. Twelve years ago, I gave my heart to God, and to-night, from the very bottom of my heart I say that the old things have all passed away. Blessed be God, for a salvation that does a complete work in Jesus Christ."

Mr. J. H. Wyburn, the new Superintendent of the Bowery Mission, was born in London, England, in 1858, and came to this country in 1879. He went into the baking business soon after coming here and did a large business, having several stores. For years he enjoyed prosperity. He was married in 1884, and shortly afterward his drinking career began and for about four years he was a habitual drunkard, losing business, home, friends, and everything that makes life happy in this world. "I had never lived a Christian life," Mr. Wyburn explains, "and knew nothing of the love of Jesus. I was a confirmed infidel, but eight years ago, God directed my footsteps to the McAuley Mission, 316 Water street, and on that night his spirit touched my heart through the testimonies, and the old life passed away, and Jesus (bless his name!) came in to stay. I am, indeed, a new creature through his cleansing blood. From that time until the day when I took charge of the Bowery Mission, I have worked with S. H. Hadley in the dear old mission where I was converted."

Mr. Wyburn was for a time Superintendent of the Grand Army Mission in Canal street, New York. He has a wide practical experience in Rescue work, and is already giving evidence that his selection as leader of the Bowery Mission was in every way a suitable one.

Mr. D. Talmage Mershon, Mr. Wyburn's Assistant and Associate, is a native of New York State, and was born in the Presbyterian Parsonage at East Hampton, Long Island. He is the son of the late Rev. Stephen L. and Mary Talmage Mershon. He was married at the age of twenty-two to Ethel V. Hoagland, of Glen Head, L. I., and three years after his marriage went to Colorado on account of his wife's health. She died soon afterward, leaving him with one child, who is still living. After spending six years in Colorado, Mr. Mershon went to California, where he remained six years. He was engaged in the real estate and insurance business in both places and was a successful man. He returned from the West last winter. Mr. Mershon, as a pastor's son, had all the advantages of the training of a Christian home, and has been for many years an active and zealous Christian worker.

THE BOWERY MISSION'S NEW LEADERS.

J. H. Wyburn, Superintendent; D. Talmage Mershon, Assistant.

God's dear children. I am rejoicing more and more, day after day, as the years go by, for my blessed deliverance, and the path shines more and more, unto the perfect day; glory be to God! I never was so happy or comfortable in my life as I am to-night; he gives me everything I need; he gives me himself, and with himself he gives his grace freely. I feel so much at home; I look at your bright and smiling faces; I feel so delighted. Our brother John has been congratulated on his eighth birthday, and on his access to this Mission. I pray that the blessing of the Holy Spirit may come upon him and upon all.

This is the grandest spot on the globe. I have been in all the missions all over the country, 'way out to Vancouver, and I really believe in my heart this is the grandest spot.

Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, who, for a number of years, has been the leader of the Thursday evening and Sunday meetings, said:

"I knew that Brother Wyburn and Brother Mershon were going to bring us many good things; I am thankful that they have brought us so many sisters. Nearly five years ago, I started Sunday Services for men, and I want to bear witness here that they have always treated me with the utmost courtesy. We never admitted women in the audience, because there was not room enough to seat even the men; but now we are going to do something for the women. Dr. Klopsch and I have been talking it over, and we have decided to enlarge the work, and broaden it out, and to bring women under the blessed ministrations of the Bowery Mission, by giving up one afternoon each week for a good old-fashioned Tea for women."

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

In Ancient Nuremberg.

A Town with a Remarkable History—Its Quaint Customs.

Like a medieval city, which has somehow crept into our nineteenth century civilization, the ancient Bavarian town of Nuremberg, stands out prominent and picturesque. It is one of the most remarkable cities in Germany, as well on account of its architecture and its history, as by reason of the fact that many ancient customs still prevail there. There is much that strongly recalls the wealthy burgher-classes of the Middle Ages; the gabled houses, stone balconies, and quaint carvings; the double line of fortified walls, separated by public walks and gardens; the many antique-looking bridges that span the little river Pegnitz, and the seventy towers, all point to a period when the old town was a place of military importance. There are many grand old buildings that have been preserved in excellent shape, among them being the old palace or castle, rich in gems of art; the town hall, which has also a priceless gallery; several fine churches, some over four hundred years old, and many other structures gabled and decorated after the manner in vogue several centuries ago. Our photographic illustrations show two points that never fail to attract the attention of visitors, viz.: "the Executioner's Bridge," across which, in olden times the condemned were wont to tread, and from which, it is said, the victims of the "Maiden" or the "Iron Virgin," were often dropped into the sluggish tide below; and the "King's Bridge" of the ancient Castle of Nuremberg. In the Castle itself, in former generations, was kept a miscellaneous collection of instruments of torture, such as only the ferocity and cruelty of an inhuman age could have devised. The Castle was a favorite residence of the German Emperors, and there the imperial regalia were kept from 1424 to 1806. It is said to have been built about nine hundred years ago. The wealth, being a centre of trade for many years, and there is among its people that "Nuremberg's hand goes through every land." Its rich history, its art treasures, its famous princes. It also flourished as an art centre, and some of the most famous German architects were those of natives of Nuremberg. It was one of the first to embrace Protestantism with vigor. Tourists and others who go to Nuremberg are charmed with its venerable and picturesque architecture, and with its many fine churches. The churches and buildings are exquisite specimens of carving and painting, and the good old customs of the famous nobles and the humble dwellings of such celebrities as Albert Durer, Hans Holbein, the painter, and Johann Palm, the patriot book-seller who was shot by Napoleon's order in 1806 are pointed out with pride by the citizens. Its present educational, scientific, charitable and artistic institutions are worthy of its dignity and its venerable record.

Wedding Ring Inscriptions.

Many quaint and beautiful inscriptions are engraved on the inner surface of wedding rings. Here is a list of inscriptions on wedding rings collected by a gentleman during forty years' experience in the jewellery business:

In thee my choice I do rejoice.
May God above increase our love.
I've obtained whom God ordained.
Let our contest be who loves best.
Hearts united live contented.
May God decree we two agree.
I like my choice and do rejoice.
In God and thee my comfort be.
God did decree our unity.
God hath sent my heart's content.
Happy in thee hath God made me.
The love is true that I. O. U.

Strangely Named Babies.

The Chinese are nothing if not peculiar. Usually they do things, in almost every instance, in a way just the reverse of ourselves, and there are cases where their own customs seem to be oddly at variance with each other. Thus: it is a well authenticated fact that a Chinese father or mother does not try to conceal disappointment when a girl-child is born into the family fore she comes to my call. A little boy whose parents are Christians, is called "Gracious Gift."

Joyless Young Lives.

Here is a little incident which will doubtless remind many readers of a somewhat similar one, in connection with many of our little guests at our Children's Home at Mont Lawn. Thirty-five boys and girls in Chicago who applied for admission to the Medill Summer School, were asked to answer the following six questions:

1. Were you ever in the woods? 2. Did you ever see the lake? 3. Did you ever pick a flower? 4. Were you ever in the park? 5. Did you ever ride in a wagon behind horses? 6. Did you ever ride in a car on the railroad?

On examining the answers it was found that thirty out of the thirty-five had never rust. The crystal skates are nearly transparent, although it will be possible to make them any color to match the dress of the skater. Thus a winter pleasure, wholesome and ancient, acquires new interest and attractiveness.

Household Frets.

It has now come to be generally recognized in the medical faculty that health and happiness than hard work or privation. Especially is this the case in domestic life, where the horizon is narrower than in the business of the outer world. House-worry oftener than house-work the cause of poor health, says a sympathetic writer. Frettingly waiting for the plumber and painter to come and mend the tea-kettle to boil, the cake to fry, the custard to cool—patiently waiting for the milkman, the ice man, for the children at breakfast time, for the husband at dinner time, for the son of the servant's lark at bedtime; anxiously waiting to get through house cleaning, preserving, the mending and whooping cough; wearily waiting for even footsteps at the midnight hour—these are things that wear, impair, and prostrate womankind. On the other hand, the varied movements of the body required in general housekeeping protect as good circulation of blood as the most improved requirements in a gymnasium. In the early days of our country, women of intellect did not despise the practical housekeeping. And if our environment has become so complex that only hired servants are capable of housework, and the mistress enjoys cooking only with the chafing dish, it is time to call a halt and institute a thorough revival of simplicity and the Pilgrim idea, that will make housekeeping as popular as the club.

Believe in Your Mother.
Mother-love is one of the purest things on earth and sons and daughters should cherish it as such. A man, says F. Drummond, believes in his mother; acting in her love and character keeps in straight. I have known such men. I have known the influence of a sister, a pure girl whom you love, and you do that rational. Tell me, then, is it not rational to have a friend to wind his arm around us and inspire us? Can anyone exert greater influence on us than our dear Brother? The way to get over sins is to get into friendship with Christ. Begin at once. You can strike up a friendship in a single evening. Open the Book, and you will say something to you.

Bejewelled Hindu Girls.
Vanity in dress and personal adornment is a feminine trait the world over. As Mason, a missionary at Batala, India, writes: "This year we have succeeded in opening a school in the city for Hindu girls. On the first day fifteen little girls came, but to our disappointment, a few days after, the number, instead of increasing, dropped to five. Then we held there had been preaching in the bazaar against the school. It is a touching sight to see these little much-bejewelled Hindu girls standing with hands reverently folded, repeating verses such as: 'Their idols are silver and gold; they have mouths but they speak not.—They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them.' It is recorded many missionaries that when these Hindu women are converted to Christianity they do not hesitate to sacrifice their jewels to give up the little vanities of dress that they formerly delighted in.

picked a flower. During the writing one little girl was found crying bitterly. On inquiry it was discovered that she had been obliged to answer no to nearly all the questions, and "was afraid she wouldn't pass." The boys and girls who have had the privilege of roaming through the woods, riding on lake or river, and housekeeping as popular as the club.

instead of a son. Yet, the names selected for the girl babies are expressive of the greatest pride, joy, and affection. Mrs. Arnold Foster, a missionary, writes about the little ones under her care: As I was calling the girls up one after another to be examined, I was struck with the strange names: "Golden Gem," "Phoenix Orchid," "Glory," "Joy," "Accomplished Excellence," "Forty-seven," "Hoping for a Brother," "Obedient Joy," etc. These are their "school names." It takes the children some time after they come to school to get accustomed to them. Often after calling a child several times, I have to use her "baby-name," and then she will come at once. "Grace Glory" is often called "Twelfth Month," her mother having given her that name because she was born on that month, and "Golden Bird" is often called "Little Autumn" because culled flowers can scarcely understand what it is to be deprived of these pleasures.

"Cinderella Skates."

One of the latest and prettiest inventions is one that will interest the young folks greatly, being neither more or less than the making of skates of glass. By the new process, the glass is hardened to the consistency of steel. The entire skate is made of this substance, the upper part resembling a slipper, opened up behind with split leather lace up heel cap—a Cinderella skate! Among the several advantages claimed for the new skates is that they are much faster than the steel blade. They are made very sharp and, owing to their extreme hardness, it is impossible to blunt them, furthermore, they need no grinding and they cannot Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning October 25. Prov. 2: 1-9.

ONE cogent proof of the inspiration of the Scriptures, is the fact that so large a part of them should be appropriate to conditions of life, so radically different as are our own, from those of the age in which they were written. In this age, so busy, so full of mental activity, so eager in the pursuit of knowledge, the old Book is more highly appreciated and more carefully studied than in any former one and it still proves, as it will to the end, "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." There is no class, no single description of men, but finds itself mirrored in the Word and may find there, too, admonitions pertinent to its duty. Even the committee who select the topics for these meetings—a fiction of which Solomon could have had no conception, could find in the Book of Proverbs, a multitude of passages which with marvelous fidelity he portrays them and the way in which they perform their duty.

Every one who knows himself and is not blind to his own faults and deficiencies, has felt the sharp, penetrating gift of the wise king's words come home. Whether he be prone to avarice, or sensuality, or irreverence, or indolence, or pride, or vanity, or ambition, or any other of the vices that mar the human character, he finds that Solomon in his day had seen and perceived the evil, and uttered a word of warning.

The warning word, however, is little likely to be the favorite proverb. Until the teaching of the poet be fulfilled and men see themselves as others see them, the medicine of the soul needs will not be palatable. The proverb most frequently in the mind or on the lip is likely to be some consolatory or stimulating thought which suits the need of our nature. Of these the Book is a rich treasury. The truth which represses his anger and is silent under provocation may refresh himself by remembering the tribute: "Greater is he that ruleth his spirit than he who taketh a city." In perplexity, he may find rest in the word: "In all thy ways acknowledge him and he shall direct thy paths." When he hears men talking of "luck he may remember the assurance: "The curse causeless shall not come." When he feels his own weakness and incapacity in the Lord's service he may recall the appointment: "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord." If he is depressed by the slowness of his progress, he may take comfort in the fact that, "The path of the just is as the shining light that groweth more and more unto the perfect day." When temptation drags mercilessly at him, Solomon's appeal to self-interest may be his weapon: "He that fighteth against me wrongeth his own soul." When he is falsely traduced he may be consoled by the promise: "The lying tongue is but for a moment." And when his duty as a citizen is to be decided and expediency as opposed to principle urged upon him, Solomon is at his ear with the words: "Righteousness exalteth nation: but sin is a reproach to any people." And when it seems as if he must be crushed in the conflict of life, he may take courage as he remembers: "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh his enemies be at peace with him."

MARAH.

GOD sends us bitter, that the sweet.
By absence known, may sweeter prove;
As dark for light, as cold for heat
Brings greater love.
God sends us bitter, us to show
He can both sweet and bitter send;
That both the might and love we know
Of our great Friend.
He sends us bitter, lest too gay
We wreathe around our heads the rose,
And count our night what heaven each day
As alms bestows.
He openeth our eyes to see
(Eyes that our pride of heart had sealed)
The sweetness of life's heavenly tree,
And grief is healed;
And lo, before us in the way
We view the fountains and the palms,
And drink, and pitch our tents, and stay
Singing sweet psalms.

HE LEADETH ME.

In pastures green? Not always; sometimes he Who knoweth best, in kindness leadeth me
In weary ways, where heavy shadows be,
Out of the sunshine warm and soft and bright,
Out of the sunshine, into darkest night,
I oft would faint with sorrow and affright.
Only for this, I know he holds my hand;
So whether led in green or desert land,
I trust—although I may not understand.
And by still waters, no, not always so;
Oft times the heavy tempests round me blow,
And o'er my soul the waves and billows go!
But when the storms beat loudest and I cry Aloud for help, the dear Lord standeth by,
And whispers to my soul, "Lo, it is I!"
So, when he leads me, I can safely go,
And in the best hereafter I shall know
Why in his wisdom he hath led me so.

The Prophetic Parables.

BY GEO. H. PEMBER, M. A.

THE Lord has now completed the sad story of the mingling of Satan's tares with the wheat of God: it only remains to speak of the final separation, which shall once more make it easy to discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not. And this time of judgment is depicted in the Parable of the net.

The sea here, as often in Scripture, represents the world in agitation. So the Psalmist says of the Lord: "Which stilleth the noise of the seas, the noise of the waves, and the tumult of the peoples."

The net is the circle of the visible Church, all the Christian sects which are used for the gathering in of God's people. We may, however, remark that nets do not catch all the fish of the sea, nor is even a mere profession universal. Also that, although fish of every kind are caught, there are at last but two sorts: all are either good or bad.

The net is not brought to the shore, which is the end of this age of restless confusion, until it is full; for God has fore-ordained how many of the human race shall come within the circle of the Gospel during the times of the Gentiles. And the first indication that it has been drawn up will be the removal of a number of believers into the presence of their Lord: then the separating process will be continued by a second ascension of saints, at the sounding of the seventh trumpet; and finished by the appearing of the Lord in glory and the destruction of the wicked. Thus the good will first be gathered into vessels, and then the bad will be cast away.

Such, then, is the first great revelation in regard to the career of the nominal Church. The Lord sows good seed; but the bad soil of human hearts renders it for the most part unfruitful. And where it is growing well, an enemy causes disastrous confusion by stealthily introducing disguised children of the Wicked One among the children of the Kingdom. Changed by this evil admixture, the professing Church casts off her humility, and, ceasing to wait for the Lord from heaven, strives to establish herself upon earth. Throwing aside the cross, she desires to say, "I sit a queen, and am no widow;" and, in order to gratify her ambition, enters into a shameful alliance with the great ones on earth, and suffers the Powers of Darkness, the devourers of the word, to take shelter in her branches. With such counsellors and helpers she organizes herself, and so corrupts the whole word of God by the teachings of demons that it can no longer be recovered, any more than fine flour can be again purified from that which has once leavened it. After a while there follows a time of partial revival, which soon subsides into apathy and deadness. During this period, however, the word is able to be separated from the field, though it could not be recovered from the leaven, and many a one comes upon it unexpectedly, and receives it with joy as a great treasure, although in order to obtain it he must needs buy the whole field. Then the word is again hidden; not, however, at this time by fixed and rigid dogmas, but by opinions of perplexing variety which are ever shifting like the waves of the sea. This is the history of the Church.

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

An Opportune Angel.

YOU may say what you like, Louise, I will never believe in the Christianity of a young lady who rides to Sunday School on a bicycle. It strikes me as breaking the Lord's Day. And besides, it is not proper for a girl. I cannot allow you to remain in Miss Raymond's Bible Class any longer."

"But, father," said fifteen-year-old Louise, with pleading eyes, "you would not mind if Miss Raymond rode on a pony. You know she lives five miles off, and it isn't always convenient for her to be brought in a carriage. Very few people come her way, and her mother has no conveyance. She couldn't be asked to walk, could she?"

"There is no use in argument, my daughter," answered Mr. Smith. "The habit grows on you. When I've taken my stand, I've taken it, and there's an end of the matter. You may ask the Superintendent to place you in Mr. Clement's class. If Miss Raymond inquires why you leave hers, you may refer her to me. I will take the responsibility. My shoulders are quite broad enough. I am scandalized that a young woman should go to and from church in this community on a wheel. In fact, I don't approve of ladies riding them on week days. It isn't lady-like. Now, Louise, let us dismiss the subject."

Louise retired with as cheerful a face as she could manage to keep, for she had been brought up to love and obey her parents, and to further resist her father's will never even entered her head. But, once in her own room, she dropped her head down like a heavily-burdened flower on which rain and storm have beaten, and cried, as girls cry, when nobody sees them, and their hearts ache. Louise was very tenderly attached to her dear Sunday School teacher. Through Miss Raymond's influence she had found her Saviour, and the bond between the two was very strong. In Miss Raymond's Bible Class there were sweet hushed hours very close to the Master; and, no matter what the passage of Scripture studied, the clear mind and faithful preparation of the teacher threw new light upon it.

If others had been consulted, it would have been discovered that Mr. Smith was not the only person in the large country neighborhood, a conservative settlement deep among the hills of West Virginia, who disapproved of the riding of wheels by women. Horses were, of course, in order. All over the valleys and mountains, girls and their mothers were seen fearlessly riding on horseback wherever they wished to go, whether to church, or to visit a friend, to call on the sick, or to buy provisions and dry-goods in the nearest town. The bicycle has won its way to popular favor among women rather slowly and it had not yet conquered the opposition to something novel in that portion of the land. Miss Raymond had learned to ride it, a year before, when staying with cousins in Boston, and when she and her wheel came home, they, girl and wheel, were received with grave surprise. But everybody loved Allie Raymond, and nobody objected to her going the long five miles to Sunday School in the hope of meeting her father. He did not hesitate to express his mind freely.

The following conversation took place between Mr. Smith and his daughter Louise one day after school hours. It was a very lonely spot, but he had business with a farmer not far off, and he jogged placidly on, his sober white horse knowing the way as well as he did himself. But one can never be fully insured against accidents in this world of strange chances. The old horse, as steady as Father Time himself, caught his foot in a loose rail on the corduroy road and went down on his knees, throwing his rider, who was just then in a brown study, clear over his head. Mr. Smith gathered himself up, much bruised and shaken, and went to examining the hurt of the horse. As he did so, he became aware that his right arm was very lame and he wondered ruefully what would happen next.

As for the horse, it was all in a tremble and its knees were scratched and bleeding. A man dislikes such an injury to an old friend, and a horse is an old friend if he has carried you for years. "We're growing old together," said Mr. Smith to the poor horse, which had a crestfallen air that matched his own.

Just then, whistling along on the upper road, a road considerably higher than the one which had caused the mishap, came Alice Raymond, on her bicycle.

"Oh! Mr. Smith," she called in a clear voice, full of sympathetic vibration. "I see what has happened. I'll come round the bend and do anything I can for you. Just wait a second."

"Miss Alice," said the old gentleman, lifting his hat, "there isn't very much you can do, unless you'll ride on to the next house, and borrow another horse for me. I'll lead mine on, but he's knocked up for the present, and I'm in the same condition myself. I fear I've sprained my wrist."

"I always carry liniment along on my rides," said Miss Raymond, "for I never know what may befall me, though my wheel has served me very faithfully thus far. Let me bind up your wrist."

Out from her bag came old linen and a lotion, and she bathed the suffering wrist and bound it up, as a doctor might have done. Then away she went, like a bird, Mr. Smith said afterward, and presently she was at the nearest neighbor's, and before long a horse and a friendly colored man came down the road to relieve Mr. Smith.

"Louise," said that gentleman a day or two later, "I withdraw my hasty words in reference to Miss Raymond. She played the part of the Good Samaritan to me in my need, and I am willing she should continue to teach your class, or rather that you should stay in hers. A man must be on his guard against narrowness. In my dislike to the bicycle I came near offending one of these little ones, and I am sorry."

We hear a great deal about purifying the blood. The way to purify it is to enrich it. Blood is not a simple fluid like water. It is made up of minute bodies and when these are deficient, the blood lacks the life-giving principle. Scott's Emulsion is not a mere blood purifier. It actually increases the number of the red corpuscles in the blood and changes unhealthy action into health.

If you want to learn more of it we have a book, which tells the story in simple words.

An Ounce of Prevention

Scott's Emulsion, New York.

"Do you think you will let me learn to ride one, father?" asked Louise.

"I will think about it, daughter. I am not yet prepared to say that I will consent to that."

But Louise is hopeful, for the man who deliberates may yield.

The Emperors at Breslau.

A correspondent of the London Church World thus describes the recent meeting of the Emperors of Germany and Russia at Breslau: "A brilliant staff, on the most magnificent horses I have ever seen, and showing the uniforms of all nations, surround the two young men who come riding side by side. I was within twenty yards of them, and saw them well. William is nearly thirty-seven. His proud, strong, sunburnt face has on it an expression of conscious power. He has grown used to empire, and his appearance shows that he likes it. Not so the young Tsar; he looks awfully weary. Truly he is to be pitied. It is not his fault that he is in a position apparently of omnipotence, and really, as the lives of his predecessors have shown, of practical impotence to contend with the awful corruption that afflicts his government. May the amiable, kindly-looking, too-early-weary-looking boy, and who, nevertheless, is the almost almighty Tsar, have a happier destiny than his predecessors!"

GRACE BEFORE MEAT.

BEFORE our repast is spread; Before us are thy bounties shed; Oh, bless, Most High, these gifts of thine, That we may grow in grace divine. To all the creatures lacking food Thou art the generous and good. The land with peace and fruitfulness Enrich; air, earth, and water bless. Nourish us with the bread of life, Bought by Christ's grand and deadly strife. With humble, grateful heart may we Accept whatever flows from thee!

Scrofula

Is probably more general than any other disease. It is insidious in character, and manifests itself in running sores, pustular eruptions, boils, swellings, enlarged joints, abscesses, sore eyes, etc. Hood's Sarsaparilla has been wonderfully successful in curing scrofula. It expels from the blood every trace of the impurities which cause scrofula and leaves the skin smooth and healthy. Remember

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is the best—in fact the One True Blood Purifier.

Hood's Pills are the best after-dinner pills, cure headache, etc.

the Liberators' League. Africa Offered for the Location of its First Settlement.

THE action taken by the Philafrican Liberators' League in behalf of the slaves in Africa, has found approval only in the United States and Switzerland, but in the hapless contin-nent itself.

L. MOREIRA BASTOS.

On the receipt of Mr.
 Chatelain's pamphlet,
 "The Open
 Sore of the World," an educated native of Angola, Senhor Luiz Mo-reira Bastos, felt stirred to do something for the emancipa-tion of the thousands of his countrymen who round about him suffer and die in slavery and without religion. As he was well educated in Portugal and connected with Portuguese families;
 a well-known merchant in his native land and former partner of the largest plantation in Angola, he is well able to realize the woes of slavery and the difficulties to be overcome if the "open sore of the world" is to be healed. He writes there is no hope of a spontaneous cure of the evil; that the remedy must come from abroad. He has written on the subject in the papers of Angola and Portugal but he has been preaching in the "Liberators' League" he sees ray of hope for the despairing slaves, and he incites him to action. Those who have sympathized with this new and his movement, will be glad to read
 Mr. Bastos' own words as he writes, in English:

"My attitude and work, to obtain the complete liberation of the African slaves, has the sympathy of all well-meaning men. From this moment I associate myself with a League, putting at the disposal of it my little ability and the small portion of land to establish the settlement. Please communicate to the members my best wishes for the African League. I have written in the papers of Loanda and Lisbon on this subject defending my countrymen; and at present I am sending to the Portuguese House of Lords and Commons a bill asking for the complete liberation of the so-called 'servitors,' who are purchased with money. Welcome philanthropists and good men, welcome to the Africans so many centuries enslaved and perished! May God hear our comments Africa requires a new system of civilization."

The piece of land offered is situated near the doctor's house in Cabiri, one of the best stations on the bank of the Bengo, within easy reach of Loanda, the capital of Angola. The site would probably be desirable for an agricultural and industrial school and colony, such as the people of Loanda have long desired to see established, and such as the League seeks to establish; but it may not prove immediately suitable for the first colony of freed slaves, as it is proposed to found the interior and in a healthy location. The white agents may expect a doing and efficient service for the time being. As it is, the offer is a precious encouragement, and it may ere long become practically useful.

"Foretaste of Heaven."

Mrs. Maline W., a Christian mother of Westbranch, Wash., whose home is among the mountains in the eastern part of that State, writes a letter which would be inexpressibly sad were it not for the beautiful trust and resignation that shine in every line. She says: "Little Justin was accidentally drowned in the Calispell river, after he had lain in the river forty-eight hours his body was recovered, and he looked as though he had fallen into a peaceful sleep with such a beautiful smile upon his face and lips, showing to us poor doubting mortals that there is a heavenly country where we can all have a home after death, and showing that he had 'a foretaste of heaven.' So broad a shaft of light there came from out the heavenly way, when his spirit passed within the gates, it stamped the senseless clay with a smile as bright as angels wear."

How Mr. Moody Grew Eloquent.

Few people who have heard Mr. Moody, the evangelist, speak from the platform, says The Christian Commonwealth, would believe that there was a time when he was a very poor talker. Yet it is a fact, for soon after he began life in Chicago as a clerk, he rented four pews in a Chicago church and devoted himself to filling them with young men, but he was so poor a talker in the prayer-meetings that he was counselled to let others talk while he brought in the hearers. After a few years of this kind of apprenticeship he was found with that eloquence born of the passion for souls.

THE CHILD'S PLEA.

BECAUSE to seek thee I have yet to learn,
 Come down and lead me.
 Because I am too weak my bread to earn,
 My Father, feed me.

Because I grasp at things that are not mine
 And might undo me,
 Give, from thy treasure-house of goods divine.
 Good gifts unto me.

Because too near the pit I creeping go,
 Do not forsake me.
 To climb into thy arms I am too low,
 O Father, take me!

THOROUGH

... BY W^m E. S. BAKER ...

That was the opportunity his two companions wanted. As soon as he was soundly asleep, they found his pocket-book and in it was the check. They would like to have taken possession of it but Blake had not endorsed it. There was too much risk in doing this before and they decided to leave it. It took time to be installed as Blake's father wrote a wretched hand and a change could not easily be detected. They hoped that Blake would be so muddled that he would let them count the money for him when he went to the bank.

Running the Gauntlet.

ies came out into the hall to give him a cere and hearty welcome, as he extended a hand to each of them.

They were soon summoned to the tea table, and found there no extravagant display for a rich man's table. Milton had never been in the Walter dining-room before. It was a large room with an open chimney place and brick hearth, covered with blazing logs, cut from the deacon's woods. Neither the parlor nor the dining-room looked well, however, although both were handsomely furnished. There was a want of order, a lack of harmony in arranging the different parts to form a whole; a great contrast to the parlor and library in the Seymour cottage. The deacon felt the loss of a woman's deft hand in contriving mind to preside over his elegant establishment.

One thing at the tea table struck the young man, and that the peculiarity of the silver. The style was older than any modern pattern, but beautiful in design and rich in finish. His mother had but the silver, except spoons, but she owned a relic which was prized very much. It was a silver mug, of peculiar pattern, shaped like a barrel with hoops and staves, and it had been brought with her other effects from England. Upon it was engraved the name of her little baby girl, "Maud Caroline Heath Seymour," it having been given to the child by its grandfather Heath. Mrs. Seymour was not aware that when her sister's baby was brought to the Heath mansion house, in England, its grandfather had ordered a duplicate mug for it. Consequently, then, Milton's surprise when taking the silver mug, having been attracted by its familiarity with the duplicate at home, to find thereon, "Maud Caroline Heath Walter!"

"This is my mother's cup," said Milton, without stopping to read the last name, "I must take it home so her."

"O! never, never, Milton; that is my mother's," answered Carrie, "and your mother never saw it."

There might have been an explanation of which would have disclosed the fact that the Deacon's dead wife was Mrs. Seymour's sister, but at that moment a carriage drove up to the door, and Nellie arose shyly and walked to the window. She had been expecting somebody and he had come. A few moments brought to the door a well-dressed gentleman whom Nellie introduced as "Mr. Barclay."

He was a junior partner of Nellie's father and he had come to escort her back to school.

Mr. Barclay took supper and proved to be well bred, intelligent man. The evening passed pleasantly in merry talk and card games. Their pleasure was at its height when the bell rang and a servant entered and said that a lady wished to speak to Mr. Seymour. He went at once, and was astonished to see his mother, pale and excited.

"Why, little mother, what has happened?" said Milton.

Mrs. Seymour drew Milton aside and briefly explained to him that there had been some fraud in connection with Blake's check, and as the police were investigating it would need to see him, he had better meet them at home than at Deacon Water's house. She had, therefore, brought a carriage so as to lose no time.

Milton made brief adieus, explained that something had happened to Frank Blake, upon his coat, and was about starting when a heavy wagon drove up, and out sprang two officers, and demanded to see Mon Seymour and wife.

"I am Milton Seymour, and this is Mrs. Seymour," said Milton, "but she is my sister, not my wife."

"You are our prisoners!" said the officer exhibiting their warrants.

"This is some horrible mistake," Milton exclaimed, "but we will go to the squire's office with you, and unravel the mystery."

The Squire received them with all the propriety of a country justice, and after reading the warrant of arrest, said to the officers:

"Well, gentlemen, what is your pleasure?"

"To take the prisoners to Philadelphia to-night by the first train," said the leader. "Mercy!" almost shrieked the widow, whose powers of endurance were failing, and who was horrified at the idea of a railway journey in the character of a prisoner.

"Gentlemen," said the Squire, "this lady is one of our most respectable citizens, and without prejudging the case, I express the opinion that there is some mistake on your part. Anyhow, I shall not consent to your removing her and her son until they have had the advice of their counsel. I shall adjourn the case for three days, and will hold the lady in her own recognizance for her appearance, and accept her as bail for her son. We now stand adjourned."

And the justice put on his hat.

The Philadelphians were in a foam of anger and excitement, but after some sharp contention with the Justice, they concluded to retire for the present.

Poor Blake was distressed, the next day when he heard of the arrest of his two kind friends and telegraphed to his father to come and put matters right. That gentleman with one of the officers of the bank came immediately. A conference was held in Mrs. Seymour's house. Blake could do nothing but protest that his friends had been kind to him, and had, at his request, taken care of his money for him as he was not feeling well. Milton had given him the money on the next day, and he had it in his pocket then.

"But," said Mr. Blake, "that does not explain how you came to present a check for five hundred dollars, when I gave you one for two."

"I never presented a check for five hundred dollars, and I did not receive more than two hundred, did I Seymour?"

"Certainly," said Milton, "you received five hundred. I counted it and kept it for you and gave it you next day."

"You say you have your money now," said the bank official. "Let us see how much you have. If you have not the five hundred less what you have spent, we shall have to get this young gentleman who kindly took charge of his friend's money for him to explain the deficiency, and how the check was raised."

Blake produced his pocket-book, and to his own amazement there were four hundred and seventy dollars in it.

"That lets you out," said the bank official to Milton. "Now can you throw any light on the change in the check?"

Blake then told his father about riding down with Brooks and Carter, about the cigar and the whiskey. He was very much ashamed and listened penitently to his father's reproof.

"Be careful, young man," said Mr. Blake, "what company you keep. I hope this will teach you a lesson. If it had not been for this lady and her son I suspect you would have been robbed by your black-guard acquaintances. To you, madam," he said, turning to Mrs. Seymour, "we owe sincere apologies and many thanks. You and your son have rendered us a service, and have been repaid by humiliation and annoyance. I am extremely sorry, and if the time ever comes when I can show my gratitude in a different fashion, I hope you will let me know."

GREAT SPECIAL SALE

POSITIVELY LIMITED TO NOVEMBER 30.

That the American people are quick to recognize genuine merit and to manifest their appreciation by hearty response is amply shown by the tremendous sale of the Standard Dictionary and Encyclopedia of all the World's Knowledge. From all parts of the country where urgent requests to extend the sale of our Great Special Offer, we are convinced that none may be disappointed, we have decided to make an extension to November 30. This extremely liberal offer is made for the sole purpose of advertising our superb work of general reference. We cannot hope to make money by it, for the low prices, on such very easy terms, barely pay for paper, printing and binding; saying nothing of the original outlay of over $750,000.00 for the work of editors, artists and engravers; but the immense amount of talk created will help to make known and popularize that greatest of all modern and entirely up-to-date reference libraries, the

ENCYCLOPÆDIC DICTIONARY

UNTIL NOVEMBER 30 this truly marvelous work will be furnished any reader of this announcement on receipt of only $1.00 in cash and the remainder in small monthly payments, amounting to about five cents a day. After November 30 prices will be immediately restored to regular rates—$42.00 to $70.00 a set, according to binding.

WE CHALLENGE COMPARISON WITH ALL THE WORLD!

Four massive columns, each 9 in. wide.

11 1/2 in. high, 3 in. thick, no binding.

REMEMBER! This great work is not for sale in any book-store and can be obtained only from us or our authorized representatives, who will show their credentials.

MORE THAN $750,000 REQUIRED TO PRODUCE THIS WORK.

IT IS THE LATEST AND BEST DICTIONARY of our language. Each legitimate English word is exhaustively treated as to its origin, history, development, spelling, pronunciation, and various meanings.

IT IS A CONCISE ENCYCLOPEDIA of anatomy, botany, chemistry, zoology, geology, art, music, physics, philosophy, mathematics, mechanics, theology, biblical research, etc. 50,000 separate encyclopedic subjects tersely treated by the master minds of our generation.

IT IS A SUPERB LIBRARY BOOK, printed on high grade white paper from plates never before on press, durably bound, and containing the most superb illustrations, in 17 colors and in monotype, ever made for any reference work.

IT IS BETTER THAN ALL OTHER DICTIONARIES because it is the latest and most complete, containing nearly twice as many words as are in the largest "unabridged" and treating 2,000 more encyclopedic subjects than are covered by other encyclopedias costing from $50 to $200. There is no other publication in its class.

TWO EXPERT OPINIONS—THOUSANDS SIMILAR.

Rev. Dr. Chas. H. Parkhurst:—"The Encyclopædic Dictionary is a library condensed into four volumes; a ton of diffusiveness reduced to forty pounds of quintessence, and, withal, as delicate in detail as it is comprehensive in contents."

"Scientific American," New York:—"It forms in itself a library for the busy man of affairs, the mechanic ambitious to advance himself in his line, or the student or apprentice just making a beginning."

Persia Under Muzafer-ed-Din.

The New Ruler of the Ancient Empire
Described by One of His Ambassadors.

ALTHOUGH the new ruler of Persia has not yet been long enough on the throne to afford to the world absolute evidence of the fact that he is an improvement upon his predecessors, his brief experience is full of promise. The Persian Minister in England has given to the world, through the London Illustrated News, a most interesting interview, descriptive of his royal master, which discloses the fact that he begins his reign in high favor with the Persian people as a whole. Some portions of the interview are so entertaining that we reproduce them below:

"Three master minds have to be reckoned with in the destinies of modern Persia," said the Minister, "the late Shah, his successor, and his Premier. Amin-es-Sultan (the Premier) has been the chief officer of State for the last fifteen years, although the title of Premier was conferred on him only four years ago. He is about five-and-forty years of age. His father held the same position for many years until the time of his death. He is popular with all classes of the Persian people. A deeply religious man, he is recognized by the priesthood. Let me give you an instance: The town of Kum, which is about a hundred miles distant from the capital, is a sacred shrine, and a perpetual stream of pilgrims finds its way thither from all parts of the country. Well, the Premier, at his own expense, has erected on the road a series of hostels. All classes may put up there, rich and poor alike, with no expense whatever. Every year he makes a tour of inspection, by which means he meets all manner of subjects, and thus comes into closest contact with the people. Again, when the town of Kuchan in the northwest was demolished by the earthquake, he liberally subscribed for the relief of the sufferers, and induced the government to build a new town a few miles off, all taxes being removed. Muzafer-ed-Din since he was sixteen years old has been Viceroy of the province of Azerbaijan, which comprises about a fifth of the entire country. The Crown Prince is always ex-officio Governor of this province, and the post calls forth the highest administrative faculty. Azerbaijan gives the finest men to the army, the infantry and artillery being almost exclusively composed of its people. Now these very qualities call forth a very strong hand to direct them. During the raids of the Kurdish tribes headed by Sheikh Obeidullah, the present Shah was directly responsible for the suppression of these hordes, who, numbering about eighty thousand, were mainly armed with Martini rifles acquired by plundering the battlefields in the Russo-Turkish War. He proved his military skill by inflicting severe defeats upon Sheikh Obeidullah (who fled to Turkey, and passed a miserable life in confinement at Taif, where he died), and dispersing his formidable army, which was devastating the country.

"The late Shah's eldest son, who is three years older than Muzafer-ed-Din, never has had any idea whatever of succeeding, because in Persia the heir-apparent must be the son of royal parents on both sides. His Majesty's eldest son, Eteza-des-Sultaneh, a very intelligent and well-educated prince, fulfils this condition, and will accordingly succeed his father. Muzafer-ed-Din is better qualified by nature to rule than his brother, able as the latter is believed to be as the Governor of a province. He has the kindest disposition, is extremely generous—and he has gained the good-will of everybody."

"What is he like in personal appearance?"

"He is a powerfully-built man, fond of outdoor sports. Deeply versed in theology, he reads and speaks French with greater facility than his father, having studied from his childhood, not only the language, but all that is taught in Western schools, and not at the expense of his Eastern learning, in which he excels. He often amuses himself by rendering Persian poetry into Arabic, doing so with ease and elegance. His theological acquirements have placed him in the very good graces of the priesthood; and, like his father, he has studied European politics. Since succeeding, among the numerous edicts he has issued is one for the perpetual abolition of all taxes and dues on bread and meat, and another is for the strict observance of the rule that honors and distinctions should be conferred for merit alone."

MUZAHER-ED-DIN, SHAH OF PERSIA.

"ALL ARE DELIGHTED."

Is it not impressive when Thousands upon Thousands of Ladies, writing from Cities, Towns, Villages, Hamlets and Rural Districts, take the trouble to acknowledge the receipt of their spoons in one unanimous chorus—"WE ARE ALL DELIGHTED!"

Does it not give Tremendous Emphasis to our oft-repeated assertion that this set of Six Genuine World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons, full size for daily use, is an INCOMPARABLE BARGAIN—a matchless opportunity—the most startling offer ever made by a reliable firm? And is it not convincing evidence of their genuine value that year after year since the great World's Fair closed its gates forever the demand for these marvelous spoons has increased as the years recede? "WE ARE ALL DELIGHTED" is something for every woman to remember. For, whether she has a birthday token to give, or a wedding gift in view, or is bothered about a suitable Christmas present, or needs a beautiful set of spoons for the table, or wishes to leave coming generations a memorial of the great World's Fair, she cannot do better than join the great chorus of Delighted ones.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: John 15: 1: "My Father is the husbandman."

THIS last summer, having gone in different directions over between five and six thousand miles of harvest lands, I can hardly open my Bible without smelling the breath of new-mown hay and seeing the golden light of the wheat field. And when I open my Bible to take my text, the Scripture leaf rustles like the tassels of the corn.

We were nearly all of us born in the country. We dropped corn in the hill, and went on Saturday to the mill, tying the grist in the centre of the sack so that the contents on either side the horse balanced each other; and drove the cattle ahead, our bare feet wet with the dew, and rode the horses with the halter to the brook until we fell off, and hunted the mow for nests until the feathered occupants went cackling away. We were nearly all of us born in the country, and all would have stayed there had not some adventurous lad on his vacation come back with better clothes and softer hands, and set the whole village on fire with ambition for city life. So we all understand rustic allusions. The Bible is full of them. In Christ's sermon on the Mount you could see the full-blown lilies and the glossy back of the crow's wing as it flies over Mount Olivet. David and John, Paul and Isaiah find in country life a source of frequent illustration, while Christ in the text takes the responsibility of calling God a farmer, declaring: "My Father is the husbandman."

Noah was the first farmer. We say nothing about Cain, the tiller of the soil. Adam was a gardener on a large scale, but to Noah was given all the acres of the earth. Elisha was an agriculturist, not cultivating a ten-acre lot, for we find him plowing with twelve yoke of oxen. In Bible times the land was so plenty and the inhabitants so few that Noah was right when he gave to every inhabitant a certain portion of land; that land, if cultivated, ever after to be his own possession. Just as in Nebraska the United States Government on payment of $16, years ago gave preemption right to 160 acres to any man who would settle there and cultivate the soil.

All classes of people were expected to cultivate ground except ministers of religion. It was supposed that they would have their time entirely occupied with their own profession, although I am told that sometimes ministers do plunge so deeply into worldliness that they remind one of what Thomas Fraser said in regard to a man in his day who preached very well, but lived very ill: "When he is out of the pulpit, it is a pity he should ever go into it, and when he is in the pulpit, it is a pity he should ever leave it."

They were not small crops raised in those times. From those times, the plow turned up very rich soil, and raised very good crops. Pliny tells of one stalk of grain that bore a hundred ears. The ground was so rich that it could be plowed in any direction, and a river wherever it was wanted,

Solomon refers when he says: "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, and he turneth it as the rivers of water are turned, whithersoever he will."

The wild beasts were caught, and then a hook was put into their nose, and then they were led over the field, and to that God refers when he says to wicked Sennacherib: "I will put a hook in thy nose and I will bring thee back by the way which thou camest." And God has a hook in every bad man's nose, whether it be Nebuchadnezzar or Ahab or Herod. He may think himself very independent, but sometime in his life, or in the hour of his death, he will find that the Lord Almighty has a hook in his nose.

This was the rule in regard to the culture of the ground: "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together," illustrating the folly of ever putting intelligent and useful and pliable men in association with the stubborn and the unmanageable. The vast majority of troubles in the churches and in reformatory institutions comes from the disregard of this command of the Lord: "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together."

There were large amounts of property invested in cattle. The Moabites paid 100,000 sheep as an annual tax. Job had 7,000 sheep, 3,000 camels, 500 yoke of oxen. The time of vintage was ushered in with mirth and music. The clusters of the vine were put into the wine-press, and then five men would get into the press and trample out the juice from the grape until their garments were saturated with the wine and had become the emblems of slaughter. Christ himself, wounded until covered with the blood of crucifixion, making use of this allusion when the question was asked: "Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel and thy garments like one who treadeth the wine-vat?" He responded: "I have trodden the wine-press alone."

In all ages there has been great honor paid to agriculture. Seven-eighths of the people in every country are disciples of the plow. A government is strong in proportion as it is supported by an athletic and industrious yeomanry. So long ago as before the fall of Carthage, Strabo wrote twenty-eight books on agriculture; Hesiod wrote a poem on the same subject—"The Works and Days." Cato was a greater farmer than a husbandman than of all his military conquests. But I must not be tempted into a discussion of agricultural conquests. Standing amid the harvests and orchards and vineyards of our own country—larger harvests than have ever before been gathered—I want to run out the analogy between the production of crops and the growth of grace in the soul—all these sacred writers making use of that analogy.

In the first place, I remark, in grace as in the fields, there must be a plow. That which theologians call conviction is only the plow-share turning up the sins that have been rooted and matted in the soul. A farmer said to his indolent son: "There are a hundred dollars buried deep in that field." The son went to work and plowed the field from fence to fence, and he plowed it very deep, and then complained that he had not found the money; but when the crop had been gathered and sold, he found a hundred dollars more than the previous year, then the young man took the hint as to what his father meant when he said there were a hundred dollars buried down in that field. Deep plowing for a crop. Deep plowing for a soul. He who makes light of sin will never amount to anything in the church or in the world. If a man speaks of sin as though it were an inaccuracy or a mistake, instead of the loathsome, abominable, consuming, and damning thing that God hates, that man will never yield a harvest of usefulness.

When I was a boy I plowed a field with a team of spirited horses. I plowed it very quickly. Once in a while I passed over some of the sod without turning it, but I did not jerk back the plow with its rattling devices. I thought it made no difference. After awhile my father came along and said, "Why, this will never do; this isn't plowed deep enough; there you have missed this and you have missed that." And he plowed it over again. The difficulty with a great many people is that they are only scratched with conviction when the subsoil plow of God's truth ought to be put in up to the beam.

My word is to all Sabbath School teachers, to all parents, to all Christian workers—Plow deep! Plow deep!

And if in your own personal experience you are apt to take a lenient view of the sinful side of your nature, put down into your soul the ten commandments which reveal the holiness of God, and that sharp and glittering coulter will turn up your soul to the deepest depths. If a man preaches to you that you are only a little out of order by reason of sin and that you need only a little fixing-up, he deceives! You have suffered an appalling injury by reason of sin. There are quick poisons and slow poisons, but the druggist could give you one drop that could kill the body. And sin is like that drug; so virulent, so poisonous, so fatal that one drop is enough to kill the soul.

Deep plowing for a crop. Deep plowing for a soul. Broken heart or no religion. Broken soil or no harvest. Why was it that David and the jailer and the publican and Paul made such ado about their sins? Had they lost their senses? No. The plow-share struck them. Conviction turned up a great many things that were forgotten. As a farmer plowing sometimes turns up the skeleton of a man or the anatomy of a monster long ago buried, so the plowshare of conviction turns up the ghastly skeletons of sins long ago entombed. Geologists never brought up from the depths of the mountain mightier ichthyosaurus or megatherium.

But what means all this crooked plowing, these crooked furrows, the repentance that amounts to nothing, the repentance that ends in nothing? Men groan over their sins, but get no better. They weep, but their tears are not counted. They get convicted, but not converted. What is the reason? I remember that on the farm we set a standard with a red flag at the other end of the field. We kept our eye on that. We aimed at that. We plowed up to that. Losing sight of that we made a crooked furrow. Keeping our eye on that we made a straight furrow. Now in this matter of conviction we must have some standard to guide us. It is a red standard that God has set at the other end of the field. It is the Cross. Keeping your eye on that you will make a straight furrow. Losing sight of it you will make a crooked furrow. Plow up to the Cross. Aim not at either end of the horizontal piece of the Cross, but at the upright piece, at the centre of it, the heart of the Son of God who bore your sins and made satisfaction. Crying and weeping will not bring you through. "Him hath God exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour to give repentance." Oh, plow up to the Cross!

Again, I remark, in grace as in the field there must be a sowing. In the autumnal weather you find the farmer going across the field at a stride of about twenty-three inches, and at every stride he puts his hand into the sack of seed and he sprinkles the seed-corn over the field. It looks silly to a man who does not know what he is doing. He is doing a very important work. He is scattering the winter grain, and though the snow may come, the next year there will be a great crop. Now, that is what we are doing when we are preaching the Gospel—we are scattering the seed. It is the foolishness of preaching, but it is the winter grain; and though the snow of worldliness may come down upon it, it will yield after awhile glorious harvest. Let us be sure we sow the right kind of seed. Sow mullen stalk and mullen stalk will come up. Sow Canada thistles and Canada thistles will come up. Sow wheat and wheat will come up. Let us distinguish between truth and error. Let us know the difference between wheat and heliopterus and henbane.

The largest denomination in this country is the denomination of Nothingness. Their religion is a system of negation. You say to one of them, "What do you believe?" "Well, I don't believe in anything." "What do you believe in baptism?" "Well, I don't believe in the perseverance of the saints." "Well, now tell me what you do believe?" "Well, I don't believe in the eternal punishment of the wicked. So their religion is a row of ciphers. Believe something and teach it; or to rescue the figure of my text, scatter abroad the right kind of seed.

A minister the other day preached a sermon calculated to set the denominations of Christians quarrelling. He was sowing nettles. A minister the other day advised that he would preach a sermon on the superiority of transcendental and organized forces to untranscendental and unorganized forces. What was he sowing? Weeds. The Lord Jesus Christ nineteen centuries ago planted the divine seed of doctrine. It sprang up. On one side of the stalk are all the churches of Christendom. On the other side of the stalk are all the free governments of the earth. On the top there shall be a flowering millennium after awhile. All from the Good seed of doctrine. Every word that a parent, or Sabbath school teacher, or city missionary, or other Christian worker speaks for Christ, comes up. Yea, it comes up with compound interest—you saving the soul, that one saving ten, the ten a hundred, the hundred a thousand, the thousand ten thousand, the ten thousand a hundred thousand—on, on forever.

Again, I remark, in grace as in the field there must be a harrowing. I refer not to a harrow that goes over the field in order to prepare the ground for the seed, but a harrow which goes over after the seed is sown, lest the birds pick up the seed, sinking it down into the earth so that it can take root. You know a harrow. It is made of bars of wood nailed across each other, and the underside of each bar is furnished with sharp teeth, and when the horses are hitched to it goes tearing and leaping across the field driving the seed down into the earth until it springs up in the harvest. Persecution, sorrow, persecution are the harrows that sink the Gospel truth into the heart. These were truths that you heard in the days of the apostles, they have not affected you until recently. Some great trouble came over you, and the truth was harrowed and it has come up. What did God do in this country in 1857? For a century there was the Gospel preached, but a great deal of it produced no result. Then God harnessed a wild panic to a harrow, a commercial disaster, and that harrow went down Wall Street, and up Wall Street down Third Street, and up Third Street down State Street, and up State Street down Pennsylvania Avenue, and up Pennsylvania Avenue, until the whole land was torn to pieces as it had never been before. What followed the harrow? A great awakening in which there were 50,000 souls brought into the kingdom of God. No harrow, no crop.

Again, I remark, in grace as in the field there must be a reaping. Many Christians speak of religion as though it were a of economics or insurance. They expect to reap in the next world. Oh, no! It is the time to reap. Gather up the harvest of the Christian religion this morning, this afternoon, this night. If you have as much grace as you would like to have, thank God for what you have, and ask for more. You are no worse enslaved than Joseph, no worse troubled than was David, no worse scourged than was Paul. Amid the rattling of fetters, and amid the gloom of dungeons, and amid the horrors of shipwreck, they triumphed in the arms of God. The weakest man in the world to-day has 500 acres of spiritual joy. Why do you not go and reap it? You have been groaning over your infirmities for thirty years. Now give one round blow over your emancipation. You say you have it so hard; you might have it easier. You wonder why this great cold keeps revolving through your soul, turning and turning with a black hand on the dial. Ah, that trouble is the grindstone on which you are to sharpen your soul. To the fields! Wake up! Take off your green spectacles, your blue spectacles, your black spectacles. Pull up the corners of your mouth as far as you pull them down. To the fields! Reap! Reap! Oh, I remark, in grace as in farming, this is a time for threshing. I tell you that that is death. Just as the farmer with a flail beats the wheat out of the straw, so death beats the soul out of the body. The sickness is a stroke of the flail, and the sick-bed is the threshing-floor. What, you say, is death to a good man only taking wheat out of the straw? That is all. A man has fallen asleep. Only yesterday you saw him in the sunny porch sitting with his grandchildren. Calmly he received the message to leave this world. He bade a pleasant good-bye to his friends. The telegraph carries the tidings and on swift rail-trains the kindred are wanting once more to look on the face of their dear old grandfather. Brush back the gray hairs from his brow; it will grow again. Put him away in the quiet of the tomb. He will not be afraid that night. Grandfather was never afraid of anything. He will rise in the morning of the resurrection. Grandfather has always the first to rise. His voice is ready mingled in the doxology of heaven. Grandfather always did sing in the choir. Anything ghastly in that? No. The threshing of the wheat out of the straw. That is all.

The Saviour folds a lamb in his bosom. The little child filled all the house with music, and her toys are scattered all down the stairs just as she left them. What if the hand that plucked her looks out of the meadow is still? It will wave in the eternal triumph. What a choice that made music in the home? It will sing the eternal hosanna. Put a white rose in one hand, a red rose in the other hand, and a wreath of orange-blossoms on the brow: the white flower for victory, the red flower for the sacrifice, the orange blossoms for the marriage day. Anything ghastly about that? Oh, no! The sun went down and the fever shut. The wheat threshed out of the straw. "Dear Lord, give me sleep," said the lying boy, the son of one of my elders, dear Lord, give me sleep." And he closed his eyes and awoke in glory. Henry W. Ingfellow, writing a letter of condolence to those parents, said, "Those last words were beautifully poetic." And Mr. Ingfellow knew what is poetic. "Dear Lord give me sleep."

So may be with us when our work is all done. "Dear Lord, give me sleep." I have one more thought to present. I have one more of the plowing, of the sowing, of the harrowing, of the reaping, of the threshing. I must now speak a moment of the garnering.

Where is the garner? Need I tell you?

Oh, no. So many have gone out from your own circles—yea, from your own family, that you have had your eyes on that garner for many a year. What a hard time some of them had! In Gethsemanes of suffering, they sweat great drops of blood. They took the "cup of trembling" and they put it to their hot lips and they cried, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." With tongues of burning agony they cried, "O Lord, deliver my soul!" But they got over it. They all got over it. Garnered! Their tears wiped away; their battles all ended; their burdens lifted. Garnered! The Lord of the harvest will not allow those sheaves to perish in the equinox. Garnered! Some of us remember, on the farm, that the sheaves were put on the top of the rack which surmounted the wagon, and these sheaves were piled higher and higher, and after awhile the horses started for the barn; and these sheaves swayed to and fro in the wind, and the old wagon creaked, and the horses made a struggle, and pulled so hard the harness came up in loops of leather on their backs, and when the front wheel struck the elevated door of the barn it seemed as if the load would go no farther, until the workmen gave a great shout, and then with one last tremendous strain, the horses pulled in the load; then they were unharnessed, and forkful after forkful of grain fell into the mow. Oh, my friends, our getting to heaven may be a pull, a hard pull, a very hard pull; but these sheaves are bound to go in. The Lord of the harvest has promised it. I see the load at last coming to the door of the heavenly garner. The sheaves of the Christian soul sway to and fro in the wind of death, and the old body creaks under the load, and as the load strikes the floor of the celestial garner, it seems as if it can go no farther. It is the last struggle, until the voices of angels and the voices of our departed kindred and the welcoming voice of God shall send the harvest rolling into the eternal triumph, while all up and down the sky the cry is heard: "Harvest home! harvest home!"

GOD'S PEACE.

PH. 4. 7

How oft amid the griefs of life—
Perplexed, misjudged, distressed—
O God, I waver in the strife,
And long and cry for rest.
How oft I feel—so great my need,
My courage so outworn—
As though my griefs were now indeed
Greater than could be borne.

Yet oft will come in times like these—
Come like a gracious balm—
A sense of peace, of joy, of ease,
A sense of heaven's own calm.
Ah! then my heart would fain express
What I have felt before—
'Tis not I feel my griefs are less—
I feel thy love is more.

And some are here, O God, to-day,
Here with their voiceless grief,
O give the aid for which they pray,
O give such sweet relief.
O give thy peace, thy calm, thy joys.
Here as they humbly bow—
Such gifts nor time nor change destroys.
Give them, and give them now.

A Church that Makes Loans.

How the Poor of St. Bartholomew's Parish are Helped by its Loan Bureau.

EVERY passing year witnesses a vigorous expansion of Christian activities in our churches everywhere throughout the land. So widespread is the spiritual interest, and so general the desire to do something for Christ and for humanity, that the average minister of the Gospel, in addition to regular pastoral duties, finds himself confronted by a group of subsidiary organizations within his own church, which represent the aggregate energies and resources of his flock for Christian work over a wide parish. Fortunately, indeed, is the church whose pastor, like a true shepherd, can lead his flock into all manner of good works, and who, by systematizing those energies and resources, can render them productive of the best spiritual results.

Probably no finer example of the operation of this beneficent principle can be found anywhere than in St. Bartholomew's Parish, New York City. St. Bartholomew's Protestant Episcopal Church, of which Rev. David H. Greer (whose portrait appears on this page) is rector, is one of the leading churches of the metropolis, and has a large and influential congregation. Few parishes can show so remarkable a record of Christian work. Besides the regular services in English there is a Swedish Mission, an Oriental Mission, a Chinese Guild, and a large and steadily growing Rescue Mission. Under the auspices of the Parish, services are conducted every Sunday in English, Swedish, Chinese, Syrian, Turkish and Armenian. In the line of philanthropy there are the Lodging House, the Employment Bureau, a Loan Bureau, a Tailor Shop and a Provident Fund. These are only a few of the many organizations that combine to form the working army of this great Parish.

In the operation of the Loan Bureau, as originated and conducted by St. Bartholomew's, there will be found much that deserves attention. The Parish extends from the very centre of the wealthiest section of the city to the heart of the East Side, where squalid tenements are crowded with poor, and it was for the purpose of affording a helping hand to the needy and really deserving that the Loan Bureau was devised. Three years ago it began by making loans at six per cent. per annum, and a small extra amount to cover expenses, graded in proportion as the total amount of the loan was paid by the borrower. In 1895, the Bureau was incorporated as the "St. Bartholomew's Loan Association," and was authorized to make financial loans "on a mortgage of personal property." Under the general law regulating such organizations, they are entitled to charge a high rate of interest, but St. Bartholomew's has adjusted this to suit its absolute necessities, and its interest rate has never been equal to one-half the legal limit, being simply intended to cover the actual cost of operating the Bureau. Its authorized capital is $50,000, and it began business with $40,275. From the outset the Bureau gave promise of early self-support. A much more important consideration, however, was the good it accomplished.

Hundreds of worthy men and women—many of them heads of families, who had felt the pressure of the hard times—were saved from domestic calamity, eviction, and ruin by the timely aid rendered, which enabled them to bridge over the period of distress. They were saved from the clutches of usurers, whose extortions have dragged down multitudes of honest families and broken up innumerable homes. During the year 1895, the loans repayable by instalments averaged over $1,000 per week. Occasionally, sickness, misfortune, or death would interfere with the repayment; but the great majority were prompt and honorable in their settlements, recognizing that the benefit they had received had its source in the Christ-like desire to help them in their extremity for His sake, who was the steadfast friend of the poor and the oppressed, and not for financial gain. In 700 loans aggregating $25,000, the loss was $157, or a little over five-eighths of one per cent. on the total amount loaned—a wonderful showing and one that speaks well for the honor and punctuality of the borrowers.

Mr. William E. Allen, Superintendent of the Loan Bureau, has made several decided improvements on the original system within the past year, and under his skillful management, the Bureau has reached the point of absolute self support and is no longer a tax upon its stockholders. The percentage of loss through bad loans is smaller than ever and it rarely happens that a borrower, who contemplates defrauding the Association, succeeds in doing so.

Under the management of Mr. Allen, the class of people assisted by the Association has been vastly improved. Many young lawyers, physicians, and clerks, and others, who are of good family and good position in society, find times when a sudden demand is made on the household purse, such as the illness of the mother, or the temporary disability of the father. At this time a loan of $50 or $100 may represent the difference between privation and great mortification, or comfort. An application is made to the Loan Bureau, the loan, being obtained, is repaid by easy instalments from the monthly income, and the emergency is overcome—perhaps the little home saved.

In the colored illustration on the first page of this issue, our artist has given an every-day scene at the offices of the Loan Bureau in the St. Bartholomew's Parish Building on East 12th street. Its business is something like that of a bank, and customers are continually making application for loans on approved security while others repay their loans by instalments.

When a loan matures, or the mortgage is due, it would be an easy matter to realize by foreclosure, but as the clients are honest in their intention to pay, extreme measures rarely become necessary, and the association is fully secured. During 1895, the net earnings on capital after all working expenses were paid were at the rate of 3½ per cent. The total number of loans repaid in full and cancelled during that year was 855. The total loans paid out (including those still current at close of year) aggregated $64,073.60, and the total repayments including interest, instalments and fees, were $46,337.39. As already stated, the current year, when completed, will make a still better showing.

Rev. D. H. Greer, rector of the parish, views the Loan Bureau experiment with high approval, and is gratified at the many valuable opportunities it has afforded of extending relief to worthy and well-meaning people temporarily distressed. He regards it as a success, in both a philanthropic and financial sense and a valuable adjunct to parish work. Mr. Allen, the manager of the Bureau, and who comes into personal contact with the applicants, is a gentleman of business experience, and though kindly disposed at all times toward the applicants, who are treated with uniform courtesy, he finds it necessary occasionally to discriminate. The wheat is sifted from the chaff under his painstaking and judicious system of investigation, and no applicant who is really deserving of aid, and who gives proof of honest intention to repay, is ever turned away disappointed. Altogether, the Loan Bureau of St. Bartholomew's is an institution whose efficiency and eminent practicability are now so well established that it affords an excellent example for other churches, similarly situated.

Building the Temple.

Sunday School Lesson for November 1st.

1 Kings 5:1-12. Golden Text, Psalm 127:1.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD'S choice of Solomon from among the sons of David to be king over Israel was especially in connection with the building of the Temple. Solomon himself recognized that he was called to the kingdom for this purpose, and he accepted it as his great vocation. At this time God was first in Solomon's heart and life. Endowed as he was with wisdom so that he was "wiser than all men," (1 Kings 10: 31), Solomon did not lean to his own understanding (Prov. 3: 5), he sought in every detail of the great work which he had to do, the will of God and the will of his father. It is possible that Hiram, King of Tyre, had been brought to the knowledge of the true God through David, for Solomon said to him: "Thou knowest how that David, my father, could not build a house unto the name of the Lord his God for the wars which were about him on every side," etc., leaving us to infer that David felt free to communicate to Hiram God's dealings with him, and moreover it is stated Hiram was ever a lover of David. Thus instead of striking out a path for himself and establishing new business relations, Solomon sent to the friend of his father to make a contract for timber that the house of the Lord might be built. Young men who are not wise seek to improve upon their elders. Solomon Appealed to Hiram.

"As thou didst deal with David, my father . . . even so deal with me." (11 Chron. 2: 3.) "Behold, I build a house to the name of the Lord my God, to dedicate it to him . . . and the house which I build is great; for great is our God above all gods." And the king was not afraid to let Hiram know how he esteemed his God: "But who is able to build him a house, seeing the heaven, and the heaven of heavens cannot contain him? Who am I then, that I should build him a house, save only to burn sacrifice [or incense, R. V.] before him?" And with such an introduction to a letter of business, he stated the terms of the contract on his side for a man of skill who could superintend the execution of the work of which he should give the designs. Also for a large consignment of timber, and for men to hew wood; and he covenanted on his side to send provisions for Hiram's court which should be a fair equivalent to the cost of the timber and the men which Hiram should supply. Hiram accepted the contract, and said moreover: "Blessed be the Lord, the God of Israel, that hath made heaven and earth, who hath given to David to bring a wise son, that should build a house for the Lord and a house for his kingdom." Surely there are marks of a real knowledge of God in this king of Tyre!

The site of the temple was on the threshing floor of Araunah or Ornan the Jebusite where David had offered sacrifice when the destroying angel had threatened Jerusalem.

This was a hallowed place, for it was the same spot where Abraham's faith had been rewarded when he offered up Isaac, the only son he had, and where Isaac also offered up his only son, Esau, when he was weary of his life. The actual putting of the cedar beams, etc., was by no means the end of the work, for the building of the Temple. Before any part of this work could be commenced seventy thousand men must be set apart for service "to bear burdens" and fourscore thousand to be hewers in the mountains with three thousand three hundred overseers, and these were gathered from "the strangers that were in the land of Israel." (11 Chron. 2: 17, 18.) How many "strangers" may be, unconsciously to themselves, God's instruments in the building of his Temple which is now in progress!

When the house was in building it was "built of stone made ready at the quarry; and there was neither hammer nor axe, nor any tool of iron heard in the house while it was in building." (1 Kings 6: 7). We cannot but think of

through the spirit" (Eph. 2:22) which has been in building so long, and which is built of "living stones" made ready in many a quarry where the discipline of many and diverse trials is preparing God's stones to fit the one into the other, "that they all may be one," "that the world may believe" that God has sent his Son.

SOLOMON'S TEMPLE AS IT PROBABLY APPEARED.

Many a hard blow as from an iron hammer separates from the world stones which are destined for his temple, and the dislodged stones fall with noise and confusion losing their substance in measure as they fall, unprepared upon other quarried stones. All seems to be confusion and loss in the quarry, many "strangers" intermeddle, but the fall of the stone is the first step toward ultimate glory; the rough contact with other stones only makes ready for the time when the great Master-workman shall have chiselled and fashioned it until not one little excrescence shall hinder another stone from lying flat upon it. Then it shall have its part in the glory of the temple which is being built in stillness and in secret but which the Lord, when he has gathered all his own from their quarries, will manifest openly with him. (Col. 3: 1.) Every test through which he is putting us, day by day; in the humiliations, the crosses, the disappointments with ourselves and with others, in the constantly seeing wrong which we cannot put right, and the apparent triumph of evil over good, the increasing tests of faith in the wisdom and the love of God in our own life and in the Church of Christ—all goes to square and form and polish the stones and to prepare the timber for the building of his temple. He who sees the end from the beginning has before him his perfect pattern, and he knows how to make all things work together for good until he has worked it out. The temple was

To Supersede the Tabernacle and many things in it differed from the tabernacle reared in the wilderness. Every thing was on a much larger and more gorgeous scale. Instead of the simple laver, (Ex. 30: 18), Solomon made a sea of brass standing upon twelve brazen oxen, and ten lavers; instead of the one candlestick, there were ten; and ten tables for the shewbread. (11 Chron. 4: 1-8). He also made two wondrous pillars of brass to stand at the door of the temple which he called Jachin and Boaz, "he shall establish" and "in it is strength." (11 Chron. 3: 15-17). Besides this, he made two cherubim of wood, overlaid with gold, ten feet high, which should stand with their faces "toward the house." But when the ark was brought into the temple, the original cherubim, made of one piece with the mercy seat, must have been brought in too, and placed under the wings of the wooden cherubim. (1 Kings 8: 4-7).

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE Temple of Solomon is, of all buildings that have ever existed in the world, the one that has evoked the most passionate love of the human heart in the Hebrew and the greatest interest of Christians of all nationalities. Solomon commenced its erection in May, 1012, or 1010, as some writers believe. Three years had been spent in preparing the vast stores accumulated by David. Four hundred years had elapsed since the Hebrews had settled in Palestine, and during all that time as we learn from an incidental remark (1 Chron. 26: 26-28), a fund had been growing for this grand na-the outer from the inner court, as the latter appears to have been reached by a flight of steps. In this was the holy altar, reached by a flight of steps. The Temple itself was small, not so large as some of our modern churches. The interior appears to have been ninety feet long, thirty wide, and forty-five high. It was in costliness and splendor all that it could be in size. Two enormous bronze pillars stood at the entrance, like the two obelisks of the Egyptians set at the doors of their temples. The walls were of white stone and the roof was covered with gold. It was probably the Phœnician style of architecture, but of this we cannot be sure. Within, there was an inner wall of gold overlaid with gold. Narrow slits in the upper part of the thick walls admitted the light, and there was more light from the ten great candlesticks, which stood five on each side. Here were the tables with the shew bread and the golden censers. At the extremity of the temple was the Holy of Holies. It stood across the Temple and was thirty feet deep and thirty high. It thus occupied one third of the area of the interior. The floor, walls and ceiling were covered with gold an eighth of an inch thick, inlaid with precious stones. The walls were fastened to the wood with gold nails. It was dark within and was never entered by any one except the high priest, who entered a few minutes within once a year. This was the ark containing the tables of the law, and Solomon added two huge cherubim, with wings outstretched over the ark. Gold and precious stones were everywhere and the building was as it could be made. We cannot liken it to a modern house of worship. The offices continually being made, the

from them flowing over the pavement the burning of the fat and flesh of the great altar, made the place utterly unlike our ideas of a sanctuary. It was rather a house erected as a habitation of Jehovah, than a place of meeting. The king had to rely on foreign craftsmen for skilled labor and he had to have made a levy on his own people and the subject races for the draught. Thirty thousand men working in shifts of ten thousand at a time did the hard work, while eighty thousand men were working in the quarries and three thousand overseers. In setting this enormous army of workers, seven and a half years to build the Temple. It was, however, well worth for it stood four hundred years and only twice do we read of repairs being needed—once a hundred and fifty years after it was built and the second time three hundred and fifty years after the building. The peculiarity of the work was that it was done in silence. All the stone-cutting and the carving was done at a distance and the parts were brought so as to fit each other exactly when put in their places.

A house unto the name. God's name means so much to us that it represents the good that can come into our lives. The Mohammedan ornaments the palace and the name of Allah written in gilded arabesques on walls and round window and cornice so should every act of the Christian's life speak of God who beholds it.

God hath given me rest. Sometimes the acknowledgment is not made. In times of trouble and peril God is remembered, his help is sought, but when there is no trouble and quietness he is forgotten. In the days of the Pilgrim Fathers their duties and hardships were very severe. One trial after another fell upon them. Days were appointed and kept. On one occasion, when a proposal to appoint another day of fasting and humiliation before the Assembly, a farmer rose up and proposed it. Their trials, he said, were so great as might have been expected and were diminishing every day as the country was strengthened; the earth began to yield to their labors and to furnish liberal provision for their sustenance; the seas and rivers were full of fish; the air sweet, the climate wholesome; above all they were enjoying the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty. He would move that, instead of a day of fasting, a day of thanksgiving be appointed, and he carried his motion.

Wisdom, as he promised him. This is money is worth remembering because it is a definite promise given (James 1: 3) of this identical blessing to be given to any man who lacks it and asks God for it.

A GODLY WOMAN'S SACRIFICE.

Mrs. Rose Hawthorne Lathrop Casts her Lot with the Suffering and will Nurse Victims of Cancer in the Tenements—The Lowly learn to Love "the Little Lady in Black."

ROOM WHERE THE CANCER PATIENTS ASSEMBLE.

CHRISTIAN work is not all a "bed of roses." There are, it is true, many phases of philanthropic effort that are both attractive and picturesque; but on the other hand, there are many that involve the visiting of scenes and places and the mingling with individuals of a sort to shock the refined tastes of those who have not enough of the spirit of the Master in their own hearts to make sacrifice of their personal feelings and comfort for His sake. It is well, therefore, that there are engaged in His service men and women consecrated and chosen for any task that may fall to their lot, no matter what sacrifice it may involve. A very large part of the earthly ministry of the Saviour was devoted to those who were probably classed as pariahs by the society of that day—the leprosy, the incurably sick, the fevered, the blind, the lame and the palsied. What too many of his followers, in these times of ours, are wont to do by proxy, He did in person and His disciples followed his example. There are still to be found in almost every land, faithful ones who, like Paul, are ever willing and ready to "spend and be spent" for His sake and in behalf of their fellow-men.

Mrs. Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, the wife of the well-known American author, George Parsons Lathrop and daughter of the famous Nathaniel Hawthorne, is a lady of culture, whose life till now has been one of refinement. Surrounded by comforts, she had much at command to make her happy. But the world cannot assure happiness. Mrs. Lathrop, in whose heart the love of the Master and his work has glowed brightly, felt that she had a mission in the fields and that a higher duty than the demands of society called her to labor among the poor and neglected sick ones of the New York tenements. In order to prepare for this work, she voluntarily withdrew from society, and hiring apartments on the east side, she resolved to devote herself wholly to nursing and caring for the victims of that terrible disease—cancer, who are far more numerous in New York than is generally known. There are not enough hospitals to treat half the cases that arise, and the result is an amount of pain and suffering, mostly in humble tenement homes, that few are aware of. To deal with such cases, to relieve pain, cleanse and dress the wounds and perform offices that few would have the courage to do, even if they possessed the necessary skill, will be her daily task. Cancer generally runs its course from two or four years before the patient dies. When a case is found to be absolutely incurable, it not infrequently happens that the patient is dismissed from the hospital after six months' treatment, and thereafter, until the end comes, it is a miserable battle between life and death, the sufferer being a burden to himself and avoided by others.

Mrs. Lathrop intends to devote herself to nursing women and girls who are afflicted with the dread disease. Her life will be almost as complete a sacrifice and an isolation as that of the devoted missionaries who went to the lepers of Molokai. She has been in training for this work and with the surgical knowledge and skill at her command will be able to do much to alleviate suffering in many darkened homes. Her own rooms at No. 1 Scammel street are situated in a neighborhood where squalor abounds, and the dwelling itself is a typical tenement. On the second floor she has a suite of three plain, little rooms, their entire area not quite as large as her own roomy, home parlor used to be. But she never for a moment regrets the change; on the contrary, "the little lady in black," as all the women in the neighborhood already call her, is bright and cheerful and full of confidence and hope that her mission of charity and healing, under divine blessing, may accomplish good to many. One of the rooms is a reception room, and another is a consultation room or office. In the latter, "the little lady in black" receives those patients who are able to come there; those who cannot come she visits at their homes. Although she has barely begun her work, the genial influence of her presence is already felt in the neighborhood.

Mrs. Lathrop, in conversation, speaks very modestly of her adopted work. She hopes, in a humble way, to imitate a great foundress, Mme. Garnier, of the Hospital for Cancer at Lyons, France. She expects soon to be joined by another Christian lady, an experienced Boston nurse, who will enter heart and soul into the work. Later, there may be a third, and the trio will labor without any expectation of gain or reward, for His sake who went about doing good. They will both love and respect those whom they attend, and will try to win their hearts as well as to ease their sufferings. Usually the incurable class of poor patients find little consideration, and this is specially true of the victims of cancer.

Although Mrs. Lathrop's rooms are in a tenement they are, all three, models of neatness, with quiet-tinted paper on the walls, painted floors, and snowy window-curtains that do not shut out any of the sunlight. With her own delicate hands this cultured woman has scrubbed and decorated and painted the apartments, saving for her work what she would have paid to others for doing this. She hopes in time, with the aid and co-operation of those who may feel a sympathetic interest in the work, to be able to found an hospital; but for the present her own time, energies, and meagre income will all be needed to conduct the duties on hand. Growth must be left to the future, and to the interest the work may kindle in the hearts of God's people everywhere. Her field of operations is one that has within its boundaries probably as much of suffering as any section of its size in any large city on the globe, and more than many; and she believes that when this is once known and understood, generous impulses will bring many workers to it, especially if the facts are investigated by those who are interested in the effort she is now making.

This "little lady in black," who has so nobly thrown her life on the side of suffering humanity for conscience sake, deserves the special prayers, and the heartiest support of the Christian mothers and daughters of America.

A Chinese Baptism.

In a letter from Rev. W. H. Cossun, a Baptist missionary at Ningpo, China, the following incident is related: "I took one trip to Nying Kong Gyiao while at the hills and had a very interesting time. I had the privilege of baptizing the most influential man of the village where my young assistant is working, and another with him. The work is moving there and at Kyin Ao, and the Evil One has not been idle, which is a good sign that active work is doing. We are planning a men's class at New Year's time after the pattern of the women's class now in session. We can, however, only get the men together for a month at the best, but that is better than nothing and we hope the stimulus to their interest in the Word will lead them to more sacrifice next year. The influential man people, and he said he would. And as the Lord would have it, a very strong friend of the man's came along just at the baptism, and said, 'What! Jingling being baptized!' And as he was a violent opposer of the Gospel, we knew that the witness was perfect, for from this man the news would spread everywhere that Jingling had united with the church. We were all rejoiced at the incident."

By such brave examples as this, the Gospel has won many noble hearts in China, and there are evidences on every side that the influence of a life like that of "Jingling" is a power for good among these simple people.

The Dauphin Island Mission.

Mrs. O. E. Stombaugh, of the Dauphin Island Mission, Mobile Co., Ala., writes that a post office has been established on Dauphin Island. The mission workers though still facing many hardships are greatly encouraged, and are now planning for a Tabernacle to extend the work. They thank their friends for past help, and will be glad of suitable religious literature, and any other aid that can be sent.

DISCIPLES IN CONFERENCE.

The Year's Work of the Young and Energetic Church of the Disciples Discussed in the Annual Conference of Ministers at Springfield, Ill.

THE LINCOLN MONUMENT

THE City of Springfield, Ill., is this year the Mecca of the representatives of one of the youngest and most aggressive of denominations. It is estimated that not less than two thousand ministers and lay delegates of the Church of the Disciples are assembled in the Illinois State Capitol, in their annual Convention. Among all the religious conventions of the year this assembly always attracts attention, because of its wonderful energy and progress. That the church has in its membership a million persons, is practical evidence of its marvellous vitality and force. The convention is a conference rather than a legislative body. As it boasts no creed but the Bible, and as the utmost latitude is allowed to its ministers in interpreting it, there are no questions of revision to consider, nor are there any cases of heresy to be tried. The convention's business is to hear from its officers the condition of the finances of the Church, to hear from its Mission Boards what have been the enterprises of the past year, and what they propose to do in the ensuing year; to hear from the workers at home and abroad the story of their efforts, their successes and failures, to discuss the best measures and methods for spreading abroad in this country and in foreign lands the knowledge of the Gospel. We are indebted to Rev. S. T. Willis, pastor of the Second Church of the Disciples in New York, for the portraits of the leaders of the Convention which appear on this page, and for the statistics of the year's work which will by this time have been given to the Convention.

One of the most important departments of the work of the Church, the report of which is always anticipated with interest is the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, over which Mrs. O. A. Burgess, of Indianapolis will preside. This Mission Board has just passed the twenty-second anniversary of its organization. It is a most energetic and vigorous society and has done a rapidly increasing and abounding work. This Board has about fifty missionaries in the United States, India, and Jamaica. Each state sustains an auxiliary organization, which looks after the women's work in its territory. In different portions of the West the Board sustains a number of general evangelists, and supports a flourishing Chinese Mission at Portland, Oregon. Their work both in India and Jamaica is prospering, and they are constantly reinforcing it by adding new missionaries to the staff of workers. Some have been sent out during the past year, and others are about to start. The Board is doing along educational lines. The Board of Education representing nearly all the forty colleges and universities of the Disciples of Christ, will hold special and important meetings, as will the Sunday School forces under the national Superintendent, Mr. R. H. Wagner.

Last year they raised $100,000 for mission work, about $50,000 of which was for the support of the Foreign Christian Missionary Convention, after an absence of twelve months on a missionary circuit of the globe will be the occasion of joy to many hearts. Mr. McLean will report on his world-wide tour. This Society is carrying on a great work addresses before the Woman's Convention will be on "Missions in Jamaica," "Orphanage Work in India," "The School of Missions," "Missionary Martyrs," and "Woman's Missionary Social Unions."

Not less important is the American Christian Missionary Society, which will have two days' sessions under the presidency of Dr. J. H. Hardin, President of Eureka College. Corresponding Secretary Benjamin L. Smith, in a recent letter describing the work of this Society, says: "We began the year with an indebtedness of $8,600, from which our missionaries were suffering keenly. During the year there has been no diminution in the work, and all the indebtedness has been paid and we have a small balance in the treasury. We are maintaining work in Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Illinois, Mississippi, Minnesota, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, Nova Scotia, Oklahoma, Ontario, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Washington. One of the most hopeful features of the work is that of city evangelization. In Chicago alone our evangelist organized four churches and three missions during the past year. The calls for money and men are many and urgent, and the outlook for next year is full of promise. The recommendations of the Society are: that the work of negro evangelization be united to the work of the Home Board, and that the two secretaries be joint agents for both works. The appointment of a Christian Endeavor Day for Home Missions is necessary, in order to a symmetrical missionary education of the young people. That a Jubilee Fund be created by a permanent endowment fund upon which the Board can borrow money in time of special stringency."

In these two days' sessions special attention will be given of which has not yet been proposed. Though this work is comparatively new among the Disciples of Christ, they are nevertheless accomplishing great things. They sustain a colored Bible School at Louisville and industrial, educational enterprises at Mt. Willing, Ala., and Edwards, Miss., all of which are in a flourishing condition and

The reappearance of Secretary McLean in the Foreign Christian Missionary Convention, after an absence of twelve months on a missionary circuit of the globe will be the occasion of joy to many hearts. Mr. McLean will report on his world-wide tour. This Society is carrying on a great work in England, Scandinavia, Turkey, India, Japan, and China. It has about sixty-five stations and out-stations and sustains prosperous schools in Japan, China, and India. The whole number of accessions from the beginning is about 9000. They support about 140 missionaries and helpers.

The Christian Endeavor Societies and Sunday Schools give liberal sums on special days, to the foreign work. Last year, however, only about one-third of all the churches gave anything to Foreign Missions. And while the percentage is increasing each year, the problem with the Disciples as with most other churches is how to increase more rapidly the number of contributing churches.

Though the past year has been one of some grave difficulties on account of protracted hard times and great political excitement, yet substantial progress has been made. Five new missionaries have been added to the force, more churches and Sunday Schools have made offerings than ever before, more missionary intelligence has been disseminated, and more money has been received than ever before in the history of the work. A month ago the receipts had reached $90,000.

Other special features of this convention week, will be the Christian Endeavor sessions presided over by Rev. J.

A Great Churchman Gone.

IN the death of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Primate of all England with apoplexy while in Hawarden Church in company with the Gladstone family on Sunday, Oct. 11, the Christian world has lost a worker who will be difficult to replace. Edward White Benson was born near Birmingham, England, in 1829, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated with high honors in classics and mathematics. After graduation he became Assistant Master in Rugby School and, later, Head Master of Wellington College. His next step in the ladder of promotion was as examining chaplain to the late Bishop of Lincoln and he was successively appointed Prebendary, then Chancellor, and afterward Canon Residentiary of Lincoln Cathedral. Between 1864 and 1882 he was repeatedly chosen as select preacher to the University of Cambridge, and in 1875 and 1876 to Oxford. He was afterwards appointed Chaplain to the Queen and in 1877 was consecrated Bishop of Truro. By this time he had established a reputation as one of the leading theologians of the United Kingdom and on Mr. Gladstone's recommendation he was chosen in 1882 to succeed Dr. Tait as Archbishop of Canterbury, and he continued in this eminent post until the close of his life.

Archbishop Benson bore a striking resemblance to John Wesley, the famous divine. As a preacher he was logical and direct rather than rhetorical, and his greatest power was as an expounder of the Scriptures, a task in which his profound scholarship was displayed to advantage. His home was at Lambeth Palace, opposite Westminster, on the Thames. He was exceedingly amiable, and to a serene and beautiful Christian character added a capacity for vigorous work that was wonderful. He delighted in philanthropy and was actively connected with many of the great movements of his time for the spiritual and physical uplifting of the English people. He co-operated with Cardinal Manning in the effort to settle the strike of the London dock laborers several years ago. Such a man could not fail to be widely loved and esteemed, and the learned and the lowly alike will remember him with gratitude and affection.

A Sister's Prayer Answered.

Mr. D. L. Moody, the well-known evangelist, relates the following incident: "I received a letter from a young woman to this effect: For years my mother, who is now in heaven, and myself, prayed for a wayward son and brother, who had given himself up to strong drink. For eighteen years I had not seen his face. This winter I had been praying that he might be led into some of the religious meetings you were going to have in the West. Now hear how the Lord has heard and blessed my prayer. I have just had a letter from my brother, in which he informs me that he found himself at Chicago; and while there, he went to one of your meetings. So impressed was he with the truths you spoke, that he rose for prayer, and the Lord then and there changed his heart, took away his appetite for strong drink, and he is resting on Jesus' love."

PRINCETON'S SESQUI-CENTENNIAL.

The Great University to Celebrate This Week the One Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of the Granting of its Original Charter—A Glorious Record of Work.

MINENT scholars and representatives of American and European seats of learning come this week to join the professors, alumni and students celebrating clude the students paying frequent visits for dissipation. Its position on the crest of a high tableland with seventy acres of fine lawn shadowed by glorious trees renders it a delightful place of residence. Its campus is the finest in the country and the new buildings which have sprung up during the last thirty years are exceptionally fine. During the first fifty years of corporate existence Nassau Hall was the only accommodation afforded for Professors and students.

The old Hall is still the pride of the University though its glory has been eclipsed by the newer and statelier edifices. It is dented by cannon balls of the Revolutionary struggle and out of its doors Washington's troops drove the British forces. The battle of Princeton was the turning-point in the great struggle the finest college buildings in the world.

It is a singular coincidence that Princeton owes its reputation, power, and prosperity mainly to two Scotchmen. It was John Witherspoon, who became its President in 1768, who raised the institution from a mere academy to a seat of learning of national importance. Men trained under him made their mark in the Cabinet, on the Bench, in Congress, and in the pulpit. Just a century later, Princeton again needing a President, turned her eyes again to Scotland, and invited

Jas. McCosh,

the greatest of all her Presidents, to take charge of her destinies. The energy of that grand old man, fifty-seven years old

the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the great educational institution at Princeton, N. J. On Oct. 23, 146, a royal charter was granted for the College of New Jersey and until the present time that has been its official designation. This celebration, however, will mark a change in that respect. The State Legislature having granted permission, the announcement is to be made that the College of New Jersey has become Princeton University. The institution has won its title to services in the cause of education which rank it with Harvard and Yale at the head of the colleges of America. The list of its graduates includes the names of a multitude of men who have gained distinction in public life. These are by no means limited to the pulpit, although in that department Princeton has a fame peculiarly her own. President Madison, Vice-Presidents Burr and Dallas received their education at Princeton and among her students have been many who have graced the bench of the Supreme Court or have become governors of their States. It has produced among its own Presidents men of world-wide fame. Such men as the mighty Jonathan Edwards, John Witherspoon, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, John Maclean and James McCosh, the greatest metaphysician of his age, have made Princeton's name honored throughout the world. Princeton is in many respects an ideal institution. It is situated midway between and two cannon left behind after the battle and now set up on the campus have been the centre of many an assembly of patriotic orators. Old Nassau is now used as a museum and laboratory and scientific reading-room. The University now has a host of handsome buildings grouped around the historic pile. The School of Science, which cost $200,000; the Library, which cost $125,000; the Halsted Observatory; the newly completed Alexander Hall, used for assemblies, Marquand Chapel, one of the most beautiful ecclesiastical buildings in the country; the Art Museum; the President's Mansion; the claims of Princeton to the wealthy men of the country that two and a half million dollars were placed at his disposal for the development of the institution. The courses of study were multiplied, the standard of learning was raised, and the reputation of Princeton for sound education was put on a firm basis. When Dr. McCosh resigned, at the age of seventy-seven, feeling that the conduct of so large an institution should be in younger hands, there was no man so revered by the students and the graduates who had been under his care. In his hearty approval of his successor, Dr. Francis L. Patton, the present President of Princeton, and the loyal support he gave him, the new President was strengthened for his arduous work.

tion of training the young divines who come to it from the University. The original charter provided that "those of every religious denomination may have free and equal liberty and advantage of education in said college, any different sentiments in religion notwithstanding."

Nevertheless, the number of students who became ministers formed a large proportion of the whole. But the number of students seeking a purely secular education steadily increased and the foundation of the Theological Seminary became a necessity, in order to keep faith with the founders. The Seminary was established in 1812, and, although it has had no legal connection with the University, it has been its most important adjunct. It is chiefly by its uncompromising stand for orthodoxy in religion that Princeton is best known through the country and the voices that have been raised most eloquently and effectively against the rising tendency to materialism, scepticism and infidelity have been those of Princeton men. It could scarcely be otherwise with men trained under McCosh, the erudite and profound theologian who at the close of his long life exclaimed: "I have for most of my life been a student of philosophy. I have been called to study all its systems, ancient and modern. None of them could make up for the want of the Bible. However important in enlarging and establishing the mind, they cannot give peace and stability to the soul. In all my experience I have found no other name than the one by which I must be saved. The mind feels that it has

Neglect of Our Own Affairs.

THE writer of the Canticles mourns, "They have made me the keeper of vineyards, but my own vineyard have I not kept." So there are Christians now who spend their chief time in looking after others while their own vineyard goes to waste. They are raising very fine grapes on the other side of the fence, but the property does not belong to them nor the grapes. We know Christians who are lean as skeletons in religious experience, who are running hither and thither looking after Sunday Schools, calling conventions, attending meetings. They are in everlasting sweat about other people, but have no anxiety about themselves. They cut the wool off somebody else's sheep, and spin it on somebody else's wheel, and weave it on somebody else's loom for somebody else's back. Meanwhile their own souls are shivering to death. So there are women busy collecting money for benevolent institutions and managing public affairs, while their own children go with faces unwashed, and stockings undarned, and minds uneducated, and souls unsaved. Busy everywhere but in their own vineyards.

Now, the first thing for one to do is, to take care of his or her own heart. How was it that the old saints, with less opportunity than we have, were better men? They had more time for contemplation. Christians now seldom sit down to think. It is drive, and push, and pull. Their only quiet time is when they are on an express train going at thirty-five miles an hour, watch in hand, wondering why they don't go forty. Just before communion they feel called upon for especial self-examination, and so take the ten minutes in which they are walking to church to think what miserable offenders they have been. Now you have no right to give so much time to your neighbors' crops that you let your own suffer. Besides, if our own piety be thin, our work will be inefficient. If we have been much with Christ, and have man of deep religious experience is always effective. We care not how poor his voice is, or how uncomely his countenance, or how awkward his gestures, or how shabby his clothes. By taking good care of our vineyard, we learn how to help others in the care of their vineyard. If you cannot raise grapes in your garden, you cannot raise them in mine.

Struggling Young Men.

TAKE care of yourself. Nobody else will take care of you. Your help will not come up two or three or four flights of stairs; your help will come through the roof, down from heaven, from that God who in the six thousand years of the world's history never betrayed a young man who tried to be good and a Christian. Let me say in regard to your adverse worldly circumstances in passing, that you are on a level now with those who are finally to succeed. Mark my words, and think of it thirty years from now. You will find that those who, thirty years from now, are the millionaires of this country, who are the orators of the country, who are the poets of the country, who are the strong merchants of the country, who are the great philanthropists of the country—mightiest in church and State—are now on a level with you, not an inch above, and you in straitened circumstances now.

Herschel earned his living by playing a violin at parties, and in the interstices of his playing he would go out and look up at the midnight heavens, the field of his immortal conquests. George Stephenson rose from being the foreman of a colliery to the most renowned of the world's engineers. No outfit, no capital to start with! Young man, go down to the library and get some books, and read of what wonderful mechanism God gave you in your hand, in your foot, in your eye, in your ear, and then ask some doctor to take you into the dissecting-room and illustrate to you what you have read about, and never again commit the blasphemy of saying you have no capital to start with. Equipped! Why, the poorest young man is equipped as only the God of the whole universe could afford to equip him.

More Critics Called For.

ONE of our best magazines recently had an article by the Editor of that periodical saying that in order to elevate our literature, we ought to have more men giving themselves to the art of criticism. Perhaps that is so. But we do not need any more of the style of critics who, we rejoice to say, are passing out and passing off. The character of their work was well illustrated by the way they pounced upon an article of our excellent friend, the late Doctor Samuel I. Prime. The doctor took a ride one summer with a family by the name of Nightingale. The ride was prolonged into the evening and the doctor, in a letter describing it, said, "the stars and the nightingales saw us home." Forthwith some learned fools rushed into print, to show that there are no nightingales in this country, and some one else as learned came forward to prove there are nightingales. And we all pitch in on one side or the other, firing away at the nightingale until all our ammunition of wit and ornithological learning is exhausted. Meanwhile Dr. Prime and the Messrs. and Misses Nightingale, of Newport, kept a merciless silence, and let the great joke go on, and the newspaper world to a great extent made itself ridiculous.

Was there ever better illustration of the fact that some people can never understand a bit of pleasantry? You might as well play a horn-pipe expecting an elephant to dance to it, as to offer them anything musical in the way of witticism. They cannot see a joke till the week after, and their friends have labored with them, trying to get them to understand it. They are the trial of the literary and moral world. They stand related to vivacious people as the owl to the nightingale; we refer to the bird called the nightingale, and not the Newport Nightingales. How drones get on in this world of hard knocks without the lighting up of innocent mirthfulness we cannot tell. Even lambs frisk, and brooks frolic, and the ass, pronounced the most unemotional of beasts, seemed to us to have its sly facetiousness as on the way up to the Mer de Glace, Switzerland, it lifted its hind foot to scratch its right ear and let us fall off. We never knew a man incapable of a laugh who was worth anything either to Church or State. He might make a very good lay-figure for the show window of a mourning store, but nothing else.

We once sat in a church beside such a looking man; it was the only time we ever had our pocket picked. When such impenetrable people are in the room, and we have heard of something pleasant to tell, we wait till they are gone, or else take our especial friend into the hall as though on a matter of private business, and bid him smother his laughter in the waterproof on the hat-rack.

But we put it down as a case of cruelty to animals that Doctor Prime sat at Thirty-seven Park row, making himself merry at the discussion his innocent lines had made North and South, East and West, amid the learned fools. They were as glad to discover what they supposed an error in a Doctor of Divinity, as ever a nightingale was to find a caterpillar.

Home Struggles.

NINE hundred and ninety-nine households out of the thousand are subjected to economy—some under more and some under less stress of circumstances. If a man take very costly dinners at the restaurants, he will be severe in demanding domestic economies. That is what kills tens of thousands of women—attempting to make $5 do the work of $7. How the bills come in! The woman is the banker of the household; she is the president, the cashier, the teller, the discount clerk, and there is a panic every few weeks. This thirty years' war against high prices, this perpetual study of economies, this lifelong attempt to keep the outgoes less than the income, exhaust millions of housekeepers. Oh, my sister, this is a part of the divine discipline. If it were best for you, all you would have to do would be to open the front windows and the ravens would fly in with food; and after you had baked fifty times from the barrel in the pantry, the barrel, like the one of Zarephath, would be full; and the shoes of the children would last as long as the shoes of the Israelites in the wilderness—forty years. Besides that, this is going to make heaven the more attractive in the contrast. They never hunger there, and consequently there will be none of the nuisances of catering for appetites. And in the land of the white robes they never have to mend anything, and the air in that hill country makes everybody well. There are no rents to pay; every man owns his own house, and it is a mansion at that.

Slovens.

IT is a curious fact that some ladies, who in the street and in the parlor are attractive in appearance, come down to breakfast in what is called deshabelle. Our opinion is that the whole family ought to look well in the morning. It is important that the calico and the breakfast dress be rightly adjusted as well as the afternoon silk and the basque. It takes but little longer and it pays well.

The children of the household ought to understand that whatever can be done by brush, and mirror, and ribbon, should be done at the start of the day. The first hour of the morning decides whether our children shall be gentlemen and ladies, or boors and slovens. But the younger members of the family will not observe domestic order if the father and mother look like a "fright." Parents are the mirror by which their children dress.

BRIEF NOTES.

Please take notice that we have no more

Pathway of Life,

Floral Albums,

Bible Helps (Separate), and under no circumstances can we fill all further orders for the World-Wide Encyclopedia. That offer was positively withdrawn October 1, and we would esteem it a favor our friends would not send any more order as it necessitates our returning the money.

The Demand for the Thumb-Index Bible which we are now offering as a Premium, has been simply unprecedented. Orders come pouring and we have never offered a Premium that has so instantaneously found so much favor in the eyes of our people as this Index Bible. Among the letters from those of our readers who have already received the Bible, are many that speak in the high terms of eulogy and commendation of this most valuable and beautiful premium. Others write enthusiastically and gratefully of the prize they have received, and all unite in declaring it a gift whose value and utility cannot be overestimated.

Bishop Walker of North Dakota has been elected Bishop of Western New York, in succession to the late Dr. A. Cleveland Cox.

Major Whittle and Mr. Stebbins are holding their first united mission at Deftonville from Sunday, Oct. 4. Other arrangements are in progress.

Mr. Jacob Garrard, Minister of Education New South Wales, has joined the Salvation Army. He made a public statement of his conversion at Centennial Hall, Sydney.

Mrs. Bardsley, the mother of the Bishop Carlisle, England, who died recently at the age ninety-four, had seven sons, all of whom were clergymen. Her husband, too, was a clergyman. They were intimate friends of Charlotte Bronte.

A Farewell Meeting was held on Oct. 9, the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, to bid good speed to Miss Mary H. Irwin, M. D., who is going to Ceylon as a medical missionary under the auspices of the American Board. Dr. A. H. Bradford, of Montclair, N. J., presided.

The circulation of the Bible in Siam largely increased of late. Mr. Carrington of the American Bible Society in that country reports that during the first six months of this year there were sold in Siam 15,561 volumes of the Scriptures, and 422 volumes had been given away.

About twenty missionaries are going (shortly) for the English Baptist Missionary Society. Three of these are going for the first time, and returning to their old stations in India, China. The Society has now 1,065 stations and stations in different parts of the world, with 214 missionaries.

At Calvary Baptist Church, New York, there was an interesting service on Oct. 4. Rev. Vernon J. Charlesworth, manager of the Star Orphanage, attended with the Orphanage choir, sixteen boys, and several pieces of music were beautifully rendered. Mr. Charlesworth expects visit most of our chief cities during his visit.

A Friend of Mr. Gladstone Being Asked what it was that in his eighty-seventh year the veteran retained so much vigor of body and mind, replied, "I attribute it to his religious faith. In his bed-room in a conspicuous place on the wall where Mr. Gladstone's eyes rest on it morning and night is the text: 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee.'"

The polyglot quality of Chicago's dialect may be inferred from the fact that the Tract Society reports that its colporteurs are distributing tracts written in German, French, Dutch, Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, Finnish, Russian, Polish, Bohemian, Hungarian, Lithuanian, Italian, Spanish, Welsh, Greek, Hebrew, Chinese, and Arabic, and finding eager readers for them.

The New York State Convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union has been held in Brooklyn, N. Y. Among the speakers were A. Booth-Tucker, of the Salvation Army; Mrs. H. M. Barker, of Illinois; Miss Belle Kearney, of Mississippi; Mrs. Helen G. Rice, of Massachusetts; Miss Agnes Slack, of London, Secretary of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union.

Rev. A. J. Diaz Speaking on his Work Cuba, at the Baptist Conference, said that four years ago there was no Bible and no Protestant organization; 2,700 have been baptized, not one whom has been excluded. Great care is exercised in admitting converts. The church members serve Sunday and do not attend theaters. Two of the Generals in the insurgent army and a thousand of rank and file are members of Mr. Diaz's church.

The Wife of Booker T. Washington, of Tuskegee Institute, has accomplished a great deal for the elevation of the women of her race. She began her labors four years ago in a shabby up room, with the cooperation of only six other women. Today there is a weekly conference of over twenty where talks on useful subjects are given, and discussions are held. Classes and a library for children have been established, and the tone of neighborhood has been improved.

The American Board's Annual Report Shows that it has now 102 stations, 1,990 subscriptions, 1,990 places of stated preaching in its field, 1,990 number of missionaries, 1,990 number of churches, 1,990 number of qualified physicians. Besides these are 260 women in the field, of whom 175 are wives of missionaries. The number of baptisms is 227 and of native school teachers 12. The number of churches is 171 and of church members is 4,644, of whom 2,957 were added during the year.

In a Recent Address Dr. J. Wilburn Chapman gave the following outline of the plans proposed for revival work in Philadelphia this winter: "It is hoped to put a number of Bible conferences in the churches, and thus create a thirst for God's word. It is proposed to have a monthly meeting every day in the year in the old Church of Epiphany, Fifth and Chestnut streets, and a conference at the same church at three o'clock Monday afternoons. Mr. Moody has given the assurance that he will be here during the month of December. The Winter Circus, beyond city limits, has been placed at the disposal of the Committee

FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Mamie.

SHE was a colored child, so black that it looked as if the hue would rub off, but for all that, when she came dancing in from Aunt Hannah's kitchen, her great eyes shining, her wool crinkling in tight curls all over her head, and her black dimpled arms and shoulders lifting out of her short scarlet frock, she looked like a brilliant flower of the tropics. When she played with Mrs. Stewart's children it made a pretty picture, Ralph and Edith with their golden hair and blue eyes, and the tiny baby Willie as white as a snow-drift with a fleece of flaxen ringlets. Mamie was always with the Stewart brood of high-bred, dainty little ones, and they were all of them as happy as the day was long, for the big house was separated from the little one only by a tiny paved walk, and Aunt Hannah, Mamie's mother washed and ironed and cooked there, keeping a watchful and loving eye on the group at play times on the grassy lawn or on the steps of the broad piazza.

A lovely home it was, that dear homestead on the banks of the beautiful Elizabeth river, and often my thoughts turn to it with tender memories. The river was full of all sorts of craft, from tiny fishing smacks to stately men-of-war, and mothers let their children play fearlessly on the brink of the waters, or paddle about in canoes, or small boats, confident that if they fell overboard, and could not swim, somebody would happen along to pick them up.

Aunt Hannah was a character. She was very tall, and carried herself finely with head erect and shoulders back. One day, when I was telling her how easy and sunny my life had once been without any cares to speak of, and no anxieties or burdens, and I remarked that then I had had more faith in God, and more courage than I had now, Aunt Hannah looked at me, her brown face breaking into an amused smile.

"Yes, honey," she said; "yes, I knows. How pious-like you once toted youseff in dem days! Since den, de good Lord, he try you. He try you as silver is tried, an' he 'spect you cum out well re-fined, honey!"

Mamie learned to read with the other children, and, hovering around when Ralph took his music lesson, she picked up the tunes, though she could not decipher the notes. Her fat, black fingers twinkled along the keyboard, and one day Mrs. Stewart called me in to listen and look. The child was perched on the stool, her whole frame swaying in an ecstasy of enjoyment. She was music incarnate, and Mrs. Stewart said, regretfully:

"To think how I have to drive Ralph to the piano, and see that midget to whom music would be better than bread. I believe I'll have her taught, too."

"No, Miss Mary," she said to her friend, for Mrs. Stewart was more than a mere mistress to her servants. "No, Miss Mary, Mamie well enuff for a pickaninny, but I can't hab her spoiled. She ain't the stuff for a fine lady. I teach her to cook 'reckly. She done play now in her play spell, but Ma-
